

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

3 1761 01108347 4

106

775'

NO TOP TRIM

SHAKESPEARE'S
H E R O E S
O N T H E S T A G E

V O L U M E      O N E

SHAKESPEARE'S H E R O E S O N T H E S T A G E

BY
CHARLES E. L. WINGATE

AUTHOR OF SHAKESPEARE'S HEROINES ON THE STAGE, PLAY-GOERS' YEAR BOOK, ETC., AND ASSOCIATE EDITOR OF FAMOUS
AMERICAN ACTORS OF TO-DAY

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS

From Photographs and Rare Prints

NEW YORK:
THOMAS Y. CROWELL & COMPANY
PUBLISHERS

PR

3112

W5

1896

COPYRIGHT, 1896,
BY THOMAS Y. CROWELL & COMPANY

P R E F A C E.

---

IN the kindly notices, by the critics, of “Shakespeare’s Heroines on the Stage,” the suggestion was made, in a number of instances, that a companion volume, treating of remaining plays and of the Heroes, might prove a useful accompaniment ; and for that reason this volume (entirely distinct from the other, and dealing almost entirely with another series of Shakespeare’s plays) has been written.

This book, like the “Heroines,” is not intended exclusively for the professed lovers of theatrical literature. It is written with the hope of entertaining the masses of people who read Shakespeare’s works and see them played, and who would naturally feel interested in knowing how the great actors of the past and present, in England and in America, have interpreted the famous characters on the stage.

Scores of books have been written about Shakespeare's plays, and about theatrical performers; but no book has been published to show how the plays were presented by those performers, and what incidents accompanied the presentations. A field, therefore, has been open to a book of this kind. So far as it fails to fill that field, the fault lies with the author.

The old-time pictures are, for the most part, from the collection of Mr. John Bouv  Clapp of Boston, and in a number of cases reproduce rare prints.

C. E. L. W.

JUNIUS BRUTUS BOOTH AS KING RICHARD III.

CONTENTS.

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS.

---

JUNIUS BRUTUS BOOTH as King Richard III. . . Frontispiece.

OTHELLO (in early days).

Edmund Kean . . . . .	facing page	4
Richard Burbage . . . . .	" "	6
George Frederick Cooke as Iago . . . . .	" "	26

OTHELLO (to the present day).

Gustavus V. Brooke as Othello . . . . .	facing page	42
In Act III., Scene 3.
E. L. Davenport as Othello . . . . .	" "	52
In Act I., Scene 2.
Tommaso Salvini as Othello . . . . .	" "	56
Edwin Booth as Iago . . . . .	" "	62
In Act II., Scene 3.

LEAR.

David Garrick as King Lear . . . . .	facing page	74
In Act III., Scene 1.
Edwin Forrest as King Lear . . . . .	" "	96
In Act IV., Scene 6.

SHYLOCK (in early days).

Charles Macklin as Shylock . . . . .	facing page	114
In Act IV., Scene 1.

SHYLOCK (to the present day).

Junius Brutus Booth . . . . .	facing page	130
Henry Irving as Shylock . . . . .	" "	144
Lawrence Barrett . . . . .	" "	152

CORIOLANUS.

Thomas Abthorpe Cooper . . . . .	facing page	160
John McCullough . . . . .	" "	168
James Quin as Coriolanus . . . . .	" "	170
In Act V., Scene 3.

MACBETH (in early days).

David Garrick as Macbeth . . . . .	facing page	186
In Act II., Scene 2.
Charles Macklin as Macbeth . . . . .	" "	190
In Act II., Scene 3.

MACBETH (to the present day).

W. C. Macready . . . . .	facing page	214
Samuel Phelps as Macbeth . . . . .	" "	228
In Act II., Scene 1.
Tommaso Salvini . . . . .	" "	244

HAMLET (in early days).

Thomas Betterton . . . . .	facing page	254
John Philip Kemble as Hamlet . . . . .	" "	260
In Act V., Scene 1.
Edmund Kean as Hamlet . . . . .	" "	268
In Act I., Scene 4.

HAMLET (to the present day).

Henry Irving . . . . .	facing page	284
Charles Fechter as Hamlet . . . . .	" "	290
Edwin Booth as Hamlet . . . . .	" "	298

RICHARD III.

Colley Cibber . . . . .	facing page	306
Richard Mansfield as King Richard III. . . . .	" "	334

OTHELLO AND IAGO.

(IN EARLY DAYS.)

---

“UNTIL four years ago,” quoth Edmund Kean, as he held high in air a glass of brandy and water, “I could play Othello with no need of this. Now I can’t do without it.”

Too true it was of that magnificent but ill-taught genius.

He uttered the words only a few months before his pathetic farewell to the stage,—a farewell that seemed almost a death-scene. On the 25th of March, 1833, for the first and only time in their lives, Edmund Kean and Charles Kean stood upon the London stage together. The father was clothed in the robes of Othello; the son was clad in wily Iago’s garb. Though but six-and-forty years of age, the once inspiring, vigorous hero of the greatest plays of Shakespeare was now so weakened by debauchery as scarcely to be able to lift his arms through the sleeves of the Moor’s robes.

All knew beforehand that this dread scene must come. Even at earlier performances, when the people in front surmised little of the terrible struggle for strength within the slight body upon the stage, friends between the wings had noted the pathetic efforts of the actor.

Ah, "that helpless, speechless, fainting mass," as Dr. Doran saw him when "Othello" had been performed a short time before the farewell! Nothing but frequent doses of strong brandy and water then kept alive the once noble Moor. "Ay, and still noble," declared Doran, aroused to enthusiasm at the recollection; "for when his time came, he looked about as from a dream, and sighed, and painfully got to his feet, swayed like a column in an earthquake, and in not more time than is required for the telling of it, was before the audience, as strong and as intellectually beautiful as of old—but only happy in the applause which gave him a little breathing-space, and saved him from falling dead upon the stage."

And yet how the audiences in that earlier season of 1827–1828 adored the player! That night when Dr. Doran was present, the Iago was Young, the Desdemona was Miss Jarman, and the Cassio was Charles Kemble. So great was the crowd that weak men fainted, and strong men saved themselves from suffocation only by climbing over the boxes into vacant places where they could breathe. In vain the stately Kemble argued with the crowd. They wanted nothing of the graceful player then; they worshipped at the shrine of the great tragedian whose presence could move them to tears or to silence as he willed.

This admiration for Kean at one time alone had weakened. Then the little man drew himself within the dignity of his own self-consciousness of genius, and bade the people defiance. It was just after his home had been broken up by the scandal with a neighbor's wife, to the great sorrow of faithful Mary Chambers Kean, the devoted helpmate who gave to the erratic actor her love and care in starving misfortune as well as in luxurious prosperity. The pittites thundered about him their disapprobation, voicing condemnation in harshest terms. He met them with ferocious courage and lofty contempt. In their turn they tried one night an insult, by giving all the applause to the ranting Iago, the minor actor, Cobham. Nettled though the famous Othello was, he broke no faith with the management, but played the character steadily through to the end. Then, however, when the audience howled for

Kean to appear before the curtain, the swarthy player, stepping boldly to the front, demanded, "What do you want?"

"You! you!" they cried in one acclaim.

"Very well!" he said; "let me tell you that though I have played in every civilized country where English is the language of the people, I never acted to an audience of such unmitigated brutes as you are!" and then he stalked slowly off.

Again, in the very last year of his career, the tumult in the house disturbed him. "Go you, sir," he cried to the manager, "and bid those fellows be quiet within five minutes, or I'll quit the house." And, having heard his message repeated, he walked upon the stage, sat down before the footlights, and with watch in hand waited for the noise to cease. Long before the five minutes had passed, the house was peaceful and repentant.

Last scene of all! The wretched, wasted body and the nerveless, weakened brain giving way when most men are in the fulness of their strength! On that fateful night in March, 1833, Edmund Kean, feeble and shaking, pouring down brandy after brandy to give fictitious courage and strength, whispered to his son that he must constantly keep at hand, for life seemed ebbing away.

EDMUND KEAN.

Yet safely the play went on until the third act was reached.

“Farewell! Othello’s occupation’s gone!” the actor cried, with such pathetic emphasis that the house applauded to the very echo. Even as they cheered, the poor man’s chin dropped upon his breast, the eyes grew dull, and for a moment it seemed as if slumber had suddenly come upon him. But more than sleep was at hand. Pitifully reaching out his hands, as if to ward off the invisible calamity, he fell with a moan into the arms of his son.

“I am dying, Charles,” he stammered; “I am dying—speak to them—tell them I cannot go on.”

Down fell the curtain forever on Edmund Kean. For a while he lingered, nursed by that forgiving wife, who at his call of anguish had hastened home to his side; but on the subsequent 15th of May, with an old play tag upon his tongue, the actor’s suffering ended.

Still another tragedy in life was there during a performance of “Othello.” On a night when Thomas Sheridan was acting the Moor in Dublin, his Iago was Layfield, a very clever and highly esteemed performer. They gave their respective parts in excellent style, meeting with frequent applause, until the crucial scene of the third act, when, to Sheridan's astonishment, Iago entirely misquoted the lines, exclaiming:—

“Oh, beware, my Lord, of jealousy!
It is the green-eyed Lobster”—

The audience roared. They thought it was immensely funny. Poor Layfield! No one knew until later that that strange and ludicrous misquoting was the first indication of the approach of incurable madness. It was with him the beginning of the end.

But to go back to the beginning of our Othellos.

It was the year 1602 that the tragedy was first represented upon the stage; and the original interpreter of Othello was Richard Burbage. Probably Joseph Taylor was the original Iago. Of Burbage's Moor we have a reference in his funeral eulogy, reading:—

“But let me not forget one chiefest part,
Wherein, beyond the rest, he moved the heart;
The grievèd Moor, made jealous by a slave,
Who sent his wife to fill a timeless grave,
Then slew himself upon the bloody bed.
All these and many more are with him dead.”

Othello, however, proved too strong a character to be buried in the tomb. Soon after the theatres had reopened, when the clouds of the Revolution had cleared away, Burt, who then assumed the rôle, though an actor far beneath Burbage in rank, must have carried out the last scene with realistic vigor, judging by the words of the gossiping diarist, Mr. Pepys. On the 11th of October, 1660, he wrote in his private book:—

RICHARD BURBAGE.

“Here in the Park, we met Mr. Salisbury, who took Mr. Creed and me to the Cockpit to see the Moor of Venice, which was very well done. Burt acted the Moor. By the same token, a very pretty lady that sat by me called out to see Desdemona smothered.”

Again Pepys saw Burt in the character on the 6th of February, 1669, and in his brief record has room not only to criticise the acting, but to add two important facts: First, that he saw in an upper box Colonel Poynton and Doll Stacey, “who is very fine, and by her wedding-ring I suppose he hath married her at last;” and second, that on his way home the bolt on the fore axle broke, and the horse dashed away, leaving our perplexed friend with his coachman staring down the highway in temporary dismay. Had the accident been more serious, we never should have known at this day how badly played was “Othello” on that night,—Mohun, much to Pepys’s surprise, “not acting Iago’s part by much so well as Clun used to do; nor another Hart's which was Cassio; nor indeed Burt doing the Moor so well as I once thought he did."

Clun's Iago had, in fact, been the most famous in his répertoire; but it had not long delighted Mr. Pepys, for, five years before this last record was made by the dramatist, the actor, while on his way home after a midnight carousal with friends, was attacked by robbers, wounded in the arm, and thrown into a ditch to bleed to death.

Though our good friend Pepys was occasionally interested in Shakespeare, yet he frankly admits that on reading "Othello" he decided it to be "a mean thing." But then, the cause of this rare judgment lay in "The Adventure of Five Hours," which remarkable work he found so vastly superior to Shakespeare's tragedy as to lead him to rank "Othello" in the lower class. We must grieve that the open-eyed recorder did not see the performance of Dec. 8, 1660; for that was the night when for the first time any English woman (Mrs. Hughes as Desdemona) appeared upon the stage, the female rôles having previously been played by boys. What interesting comments Pepys might have made, had he been there and "i' the mood"!

One of the most famous boy actresses of the early days of the theatre, Hart, was the successor of Burt in the title rôle of the tragedy of jealousy.

As for Betterton,—the great Betterton,—who played Othello with success some seventeen years before the beginning of the eighteenth century, and who played the part with equal success seven years after the century had been ushered in—his was a splendid impersonation. It was several times well set off by the Iago of Sandford, and by the Iago of Verbruggen. Sandford, indeed, was such a consummate actor of villains' rôles that, though personally a most amiable man, he was so completely identified by the public with infamous parts, that they would not accept him in an honest character. On one occasion they actually damned the play as an imposition on their patience when the author brought Sandford's rôle to an upright ending.

The Tutler, just after Betterton's remains were interred in Westminster Abbey, in 1710, said, “I have hardly a notion that any performer of antiquity could surpass the action of Mr. Betterton in any of the occasions in which he has appeared on our stage. The wonderful agony which he appeared in when he examined the circumstance of the handkerchief in ‘Othello,’ the mixture of love that intruded upon his mind upon the innocent answers Desdemona makes, betrayed in his gesture such a variety and vicissitude of passions as would admonish a man to be afraid of his own heart, and perfectly convince him that it is to stab it to admit that worst of daggers,—jealousy. Whoever reads in his closet this admirable scene will find that he cannot, except he has as warm an imagination as Shakespeare himself, find any but dry, incoherent, and broken sentences; but a reader that has seen Betterton act it observes there could not be a word added; that longer speech had been unnatural, nay, impossible, in Othello’s circumstances. The charming passage in the same tragedy where he tells the manner of winning the affections of his mistress was urged with so moving and graceful an energy, that while I walked in the cloisters I thought of him with the same concern as if I waited for the remains of a person who had, in real life, done all that I had seen him represent.”

So, in regard to Betterton’s successor, the Tatler has an interesting word to say. It was in June, 1710, when Wilks first played the Moor at the benefit of Colley Cibber, and our friend had stolen in, incognito, to see the performance, that, out of curiosity, he might observe how Wilks and Cibber came out in the parts where Betterton and Sandford so highly excelled. Wilks, like the witty mimic Foote,—who, under the misconception that he was a tragedian instead of a comedian, made his début as Othello,—was famous in the humorous rôles, and, besides imitating Betterton in the great tragedy, laid himself open to popular misunderstanding throughout. Thus the Tatler points out this fact: “There is a fault in the audience which interrupts their satisfaction very much; that is, the figuring to themselves the actor in some part wherein they particularly liked him, and not attending to the part he is at that time performing. Thus, whatever Wilks, who is the strictest follower of nature, is acting, the vulgar spectators turn their thoughts upon Sir Henry Wildair.”

In Cibber’s Iago, if Tom Davies saw aright, Othello would have discerned the villain written plainly on his brow, Cibber’s style was so plainly hypocritical, and so affected in its drawling.

Old Colley himself declared Wilks’s Othello a failure; while to Barton Booth, of whom Wilks was extremely jealous, he gave warm praise. Yet not every spectator saw Booth at his best; for a bad supper or a small house would make him too often indifferent of his reputation. Yet when he knew his auditors he was ready to act to the height of his power rather than drop in their favor.

The story is told that one night, when there were few people in the theatre and Othello had simply been walking through his part, suddenly, to the astonishment of his fellow-actors, he roused every energy in his mind and body, and gave a magnificent interpretation of the final acts.

"What does this mean, Booth?" queried a friend in the green-room, as the great actor, flushed with his own triumphant exertion, entered after a glorious performance of his part in the great scene of the third act. "Why this sudden change?"

"There's a man in the pit," Booth replied with enthusiasm, "an Oxford man, whose judgment is worth having. I saw him there, and for his criticism I have more regard than for that of all the rest of the audience."

The graceful air, the manly sweetness of countenance, the harmonious voice, the picturesque posturing,—these attributes of Booth were strongly in contrast with the appearance, utterance, and bearing of another Othello of those early years of the eighteenth century. Desdemona, they thought in those days, would hardly fall in love with James Quin, whose “declamation was as heavy as his person, his tones monotonous, his passions bellowing, his emphasis affected, and his understrokes growling.” But yet Quin, strong, vigorous actor that he was, could hold his own against many a handsome player of his day — till Garrick came. In Othello, indeed, he could lead even his little rival; for Davy, though contesting with the veteran when the latter was in his last years of stage-life, yet could meet with not enough success to warrant attempting the rôle more than twice thereafter.

However, in the general run of play-acting David Garrick was by far the leader, and his triumphs soon made old Quin disgruntled and ugly. Off the gray-haired actor hurried to Bath, there to sulk in his tent. This avocation, however, soon grew monotonous, and the yearnings for the vanity-pleasing applause of the pittites at last broke down the obstinate resolution of the veteran. He determined to drop a hint of his relenting to Rich, the manager. Hence the following laconic, but suggestive, message was posted by stage to the metropolis: —

JOHN RICH, London.

I am at Bath.

Yours,

JAMES QUIN.

Bluff Manager Rich's reply was equally suggestive, and thoroughly unexpected:—

JAMES QUIN, Bath.

Stay there, and be d——d.

Yours,

JOHN RICH.

But difficulties were patched up before long; and Quin came back to play in "Othello" for a charity benefit, and, with generous disposition, to act without a penny of charge.

( Queerly costumed were the Othellos of both of the leaders of the two opposing styles of acting,—the theatrical, grandiloquent school, and the easy, natural school. Quin, with a mammoth, heavily powdered wig crowning his black face, "made such a magpie appearance of his head as tended greatly to laughter." For dress, this Othello appeared in the English soldier's uniform of the actor's own period. Garrick put on flowing Eastern robes, and thus brought down upon his devoted head the comparison with the little turbaned colored boys who, fashion then decreed, should bring in tea at private receptions.

"Aha!" cried envious old Quin to Bishop Hoadley's son, as the two sat in the pit on the night of the stage Whitefield's first appearance in the tragedy,

"Here's Pompey, sure. Where's the lamp and the teakettle?" The apt but cruel allusion to Hogarth's black boy set everybody around into a laugh.

Sly Davy, however, in his very size—or, rather, lack of size—had one point of advantage, as he thought, over his stalwart rival. Into "Othello" he could introduce the scene of epilepsy with no fear of comparison with the corpulent Quin, to whom a fall would have been clumsy, if not injurious.

Handsome Spranger Barry could look the character, and could act it. Garrick might contest his Romeo and his Lear, but he did not dare to oppose his Othello; though, indeed, in 1749, the little man played Iago to Spranger's Moor. The latter "happily exhibited the hero, the lover, and the distracted husband," says the same playgoer who so roughly handled Quin; "he rose through all the passions to the utmost extent of critical imagination, yet still appeared to leave an unexhausted fund of expression behind. His rage and tenderness were equally interesting. . . . His figure was a good apology for Desdemona's attachment . . . and the harmony of his voice to tell such a tale as he describes must have raised favorable prejudice in any one who had an ear or heart to feel."

While the gallant fellow could win the audience as well as the senate by his tender, insinuating plea, and could touch the hearts by his pathetic utterance of "No, not much moved," he could also give to the words, "I'll tear her all to pieces," such frightful fierceness as to cause ladies in the galleries to shriek with terror, and could so impress the experienced John Bernard as to drive sleep from that veteran's eyes for a whole night after witnessing "Othello."

"It was wonderful," declared Bernard, describing the scene next day to his friends. "I sat there watching him prepare for a volcanic burst with the lines, 'I'll tear her all to pieces.' His muscles began to stiffen, the veins extended, and the red blood actually boiled through the dark skin, so earnest was his feeling, until at length his passion bore down all barriers, sweeping love, reason, and mercy before the thunder of his rage."

An odd costume Spranger Barry wore,—odd in the sense of to-day's correct dressing of the great plays. Picture him, if you will, before the grave and reverend signiors, a gentleman in a scarlet suit, well covered with gold lace, and tapering off with knee-breeches that could cover but not conceal, in later years, a pair of rather gouty legs, and see the same hero touching to the people of Cyprus his little cocked hat,—and you have Barry's Othello. His wife, when she played Desdemona, was somewhat nearer to the ideal, since she wore a captivating Italian dress.

Unlucky woman! Her second husband was no such actor or gentleman as her first. Two years after Barry's death she married the rascally young Irish lawyer Crawford, and tried to educate him for the stage. He, in his contemptible way, not only spent her money, but on his part showed a most niggardly spirit. When he tried to manage a theatre he so disgusted play-goers and play-actors, that the former would not patronize him, and the latter were obliged to strike for their pay. To such an extreme was he driven one night, that he was compelled, dressed as he was for the rôle of Othello, to go down into the orchestra's seats, and play the violin alone for the overture, the entire band of musicians having suddenly deserted him.

With Spranger Barry, Othello had been the first character to be played in London when, coming over from Ireland, he dared enter the tourney against the great Roscius of England. It was a venturesome act for the erstwhile silversmith, now barely in his twenty-seventh year, and with his mere four and twenty months' experience on the stage; but with rough old Macklin to play the hypocrite so naturally that the spectators actually cursed him, and with Mrs. Rideout to act the suffering Desdemona, Barry showed the London set, on that night of Oct. 4, 1746, what grandeur there was in the great tragedy.

Garrick trembled on his throne.

A shrewd fellow was Macklin, on as well as off the stage. You remember the trick that Macready and Phelps tried to play on Helen Faucit, holding themselves a little in the rear of her, so that they could face the spectators while she had to show her back to her friends before the footlights? Macklin and Sheridan were both adepts at this trick; and one night, when playing the leading parts in "Othello," they worked so hard to turn each other round, as to bring themselves, before they knew it, both plump up against the back scene.

This backing scheme was a game that Edmund Kean also tried. Gallant Spranger Barry never would attempt it.

Another production in which Macklin was interested would have delighted the heart of nobility-loving Pepys, had he lived to see it. That was the performance of the 7th of March, 1751, when the auditorium, even to the footmen's gallery, was filled with dukes and princes, duchesses and princesses. On the stage, under Macklin's direction, a company of amateurs, all of noble birth, was acting "Othello," Sir Francis Delavel playing the Moor; John (afterwards Lord) Delavel, Iago; Captain Stephens, Roderigo; Mrs. Stephens, Emilia; and Mrs. Quon, a sister of Sir Francis, and afterwards Lady Mexborough, Desdemona. Walpole best describes the furor this production aroused,—a furor never equalled before or since that day: "The rage was so great to see the performance," he says, "that the House of Commons literally adjourned at three o'clock on purpose. The footmen's gallery was strung with blue ribands. What a wise people! What an august senate! Yet my Lord Granville once told the prince,—I forget on occasion of what folly,—‘Sir, indeed your royal highness is in the wrong to act thus; the English are a grave nation.’" Of the players themselves Walpole says, "They really acted so well, that it is astonishing they should not have had sense enough not to act at all."

Nine months after this amateur performance, on the 26th of December, 1751, there came the first production of "Othello" in America, Robert Upton, the traitorous advance agent of Hallam's Company playing the Moor, his wife playing Desdemona, and Tremain, Iago. Thus they forestalled the initial production by Hallam's actors when Malone acted Othello, and Rigby Iago, to the Desdemona of Mrs. Hallam, at the Williamsburg, Va., performance of Nov. 9, 1752.

Hallam's successor as manager of the first organized American company, David Douglass, essayed the Moor at Annapolis in April, 1760, Palmer sustaining Iago's character, and the Williamsburg Desdemona, now Mrs. Douglass, again impersonating the faithful wife. When New York first saw the tragedy, April 11, 1768, Douglass still held the title rôle; but young Hallam, the son of the organizer of the company, had been promoted from Cassio to Iago, and Miss Cheer had supplanted the now elderly heroine of the earlier performances. The first Philadelphia production, Jan. 27, 1773, saw Hallam and Douglass reversing their New York rôles, while still another Desdemona, Mrs. Henry, had come upon the stage.

In the spring of 1769, at the John Street Theatre in New York, appeared a Moor who later was to attain a wider fame in other lines; this was Major Moncrief, the British officer. He was an amateur actor of much merit, and had consented to act one night in order to help the players out of the pecuniary embarrassments then troubling them. On the bills he was announced simply as "a gentleman," his identity being entirely concealed.

In the days when Sir Henry Clinton's army locked itself up in New York City, after evacuating Philadelphia and retreating by night from Washington's army, the British soldiery found nothing to employ their minds except play-acting, gaming, and social entertainments. With enthusiasm the officers of the crown produced at the abandoned theatres every play on which they could lay their hands. In fact, their performances were so varied that before long they had exhausted their stock of dramatic literature, and were compelled to advertise in the papers for printed play-books. On the programs they said that the performances were for sweet charity's sake; but each officer drew regularly a dollar for his night's performance,—and with necessaries as well as luxuries demanding high prices, probably found his stipend very acceptable. These same programs, furthermore (in one season at least), solemnly announced: "No children in laps will be admitted."

Major Monerief and Major Lowther Pennington, of the Guards, apparently monopolized the character of Othello, while Dr. Hammond Beaumont acted Iago. Major André in those days (1778) was a gay young aide of Clinton, and undoubtedly joined the actors at the playhouse; for, as we know, in Philadelphia shortly before this time he had become sufficiently interested in the sport to paint sets of scenery for the amateur stage.

Messrs. Heard and Ryan as Othello and Iago, and Mrs. Robinson as Desdemona (with Mr. Shakespeare as Cassio), were the names printed upon the bills of 1782 at the first Baltimore production of the tragedy; while the first New York performance after the Revolution brought back Mr. Hallam to the cast, though now as Iago to the Othello of the tall, handsome Mr. Henry and the Desdemona of Mrs. Henry. This Othello, pronounced by Dunlap, the old historian, the best up to that time, crowned a jet black face with woolly hair, and wore a British officer's uniform. Later, in Baltimore, Fennell, Green, and Mrs. Morris sustained the leading rôles.

Dissipated, rattlebrained Fennell was always fond of his Othello; perhaps because it was the character in which he had made his début, in 1787, in Edinburgh. He was not handsome in face; but he was massive in form, his superb figure measuring full six feet.

"Yes," cried Cooper one day, noticing his associate pacing up the street, "here comes two yards of a very proper man!" So, too, thought the Annapolis planter when, admiring vastly the intelligence of Fennell's Moor, he sent the managers an offer of five hundred dollars for the negro!

Naturally, Fennell's spendthrift ways at last resulted in poverty; but even though so reduced as to be imprisoned for debt, he did not lose his high spirits or sell himself as a negro. When, in his distress, an old friend, Mr. Leigh Waring, presented him with a surtout, the classically educated gentleman in a spirit of fun dashed off the following expression of gratitude:—

"Dear Sir, your surtout
Is a present to suit,
While fortune to me is so sparing.
It's been worn, it is true,
But your kindness makes new
What can ne'er lose its value from Waring."

As Robert Treat Paine, son of the signer of the Declaration of Independence, sat on the rough seats of the old Boston playhouse, and listened to Fennell's Iago, and then, a few nights later, saw Cooper in the character, he declared with emphasis that the latter was the superior by reason of his bolder, stronger coloring of the character. But all did not agree in this, for Fennell at that time was in full glory.

Cooper had made his début in New York on the 28th of February, 1798. At once the public favored him, admiring his handsome face and noble person, marking his mingled dignity and grace of movement, and listening with pleasure to his forcible yet melodious recitation of the text. At that time Fennell was playing Othello as a thorough negro so far as color was concerned,—absolutely black. Cooper, essaying to rival the favorite actor, made his Moor more nearly the color of a mulatto.

Many a story is told of the inaccuracies of the new player as regards the text of his author. It is said, for instance, that in "Othello," instead of giving the words, "Yet I'll not shed her blood nor scar that whiter skin of hers than snow and smooth as monumental alabaster," he exclaimed, "nor scar that beauteous form as white as snow and hard as monumental alabaster!"

And Rees declares it is a fact that the eccentric Higgins, a stock actor of that day, when playing the Duke in "Othello," would not be outdone in originality by Cooper, and so substituted for the line, "Take up this mangled matter at the best,"

the absurd words, “Take up the Star Spangled Banner, and carry it off to the West.”

At the time Cooper began starring, his pay was but a twelfth of Fennell’s remuneration. In a few years he was getting far more money, so rapid was his rise.

On the night of Dec. 19, 1825, when the English-born player was acting in “Othello” at the Boston Theatre, the announcement was made that Edmund Kean would return to the city to apologize for his former show of disrespect to the Boston audiences, and to appeal once more to their judgment and favor. There was applause and there were hisses over the announcement; for Kean’s impetuous anger was not entirely forgotten. As we shall see in the tale of Richard, more troubles were to follow this renewed engagement.

Before returning to Kean, let us glance at a few more of the stage heroes who connected the two centuries with their impersonations. When Hodgkinson, the comedian, acted the Moor in Philadelphia during his first season here (1792–1793), he played so successfully as to be termed “The American Kemble.” “His address to the senate,” said the Federal Gazette, “was spoken with judgment; the whole of the acting where Iago so carefully

. excites his jealousy was very natural ; the heaving of his breast, the expression of his countenance, and the rage which Iago causes when he determines to kill Desdemona, was a masterly piece of acting.” Hallam as Iago “performed to admiration,” while Miss Tuke as Desdemona “pleased the audience.” The graceful young actress, we are told, possessed in this character “a natural diffidence truly engaging.”

John Brown Williamson, son of a London saddler, and a popular actor at the Haymarket in London, came to America in the latter part of the eighteenth century, and on the 25th of January, 1796, made his début at the opening performance of the season at the Boston Theatre. The play was “Othello.” The débutant acted the Moor ; Iago fell to the lot of Mr. Harper, and Desdemona to Mrs. Snelling Powell. Later on, Williamson, as actor and manager, was to become a prominent figure in American theatrical history.

More than a passing notice must be given the Iago of George Frederick Cooke. Conceited, irresponsible, liquor-loving Cooke could rival John Kemble,—“Hark ye, Black Jack,” he had angrily cried to the elder actor, “hang me, if I don’t make you tremble in your pumps one day yet!”—and could stand with Cooper ; but by himself he could fall, disgraced and ruined, into a drunkard's grave ten years after he had started on what seemed to be a glorious career, and before "Black Jack," as he termed him, had begun his final performances.

GEORGE FREDERICK COOKE AS IAGO,

Cooke played the Moor to great applause, with the viceregal court in Dublin as audience, and then, after the performance, drinking himself into a beast, in a wild fit enlisted as a soldier. His friends paid for his discharge, and before long (1801) Cooke and Kemble were dangerous rivals in London town. But his "indispositions" continued, and deservedly brought public disapprobation.

When Cooke first played Iago in London, he had only the recollection of Henderson to combat; for Kemble, up to that date (Nov. 28, 1800), had not essayed the rôle of the Ancient. His triumph was pronounced. Some of the audience said that he betrayed so much of the workings of deceit in Iago's mind, that it was strange Othello should be deceived by him; but all agreed that the impersonation was extremely interesting and strong. The jealousy scene must, indeed, have been thrilling. Grasping Kemble's left hand with his own, Cooke would rest his right hand like a claw upon the shoulder of the Moor, and, holding him rigid in that position, would draw himself, after the manner of a snake, close up to the swarthy face of his wickedly charmed victim, while he thrust out the poisoned words with fang-like rapidity. Wriggling and twisting, Kemble would strive to work himself away, pressing tightly, meanwhile, with his freed hand his throbbing temples.

"It was a wonderful sight," said Washington Irving, after witnessing the great scene on the Covent Garden stage. And simple George III. maintained that Cooke must be a very bad man at heart, otherwise he could not so well act out such fearful villainy.

But now the years pass by until, in 1785, the majestic, superb Kemble assumes the rôle of the jealous soldier to the Desdemona of his stately sister, Mrs. Siddons. It seems as hard to imagine the one making a success of the fiery, impetuous husband, as to conceive the other achieving fame as the sweet, gentle wife. However, it is probable that Mrs. Siddons gave to the crucial scenes more impassioned acting than did her brother, since, as she herself says in speaking of their styles, "John, in his most impetuous bursts, is always careful to avoid any discomposure of his dress or deportment; but in the whirlwind of passion I lose all thought of such matters."

Possibly Kemble's biographer, Boaden, correctly described the player in “Othello” as wrapping “that great and ardent being in a mantle of mysterious solemnity, awfully predictive of his fate;” but it is more likely that Macready better pictured his acting when he wrote: “The majestic figure of John Kemble, in Moorish costume, with a slow and stately step advanced from the side wing. A more august presence could scarcely be imagined. His darkened complexion detracted but little from the stern beauty of his commanding features, and the infolding drapery of his Moorish mantle hung gracefully on his erect and noble form. The silent picture he presented compelled admiration. . . . I must suppose he was out of humor, for, to my exceeding regret, he literally walked through the play. My attention was riveted upon him through the night in hope of some start of energy, some burst of passion, lighting up the dreary dulness of his cold recitation; but all was one gloomy, unbroken level — actually not better than a school repetition. In the line, ‘Not a jot! not a jot!’ there was a tearful tremor upon his voice that had pathos in it; with that one exception not a single passage was uttered that excited the audience to sympathy, or that gave evidence of artistic power. His voice was monotonously husky, and every word was enunciated with labored distinctness. His readings were faultless; but there was no spark of feeling that could enable us to get a glimpse of the ‘constant, loving, noble nature’ of Othello. . . . The play went through without one round of applause. . . . The curtain fell in silence, and I left the theatre with the conviction that I had not yet seen Kemble.”

This was written of Kemble in 1816, when he was bidding farewell forever to Dublin, and was within one year of his retirement from the stage. Kean had bounded forward into the public favor, and at this time was so potent a factor as to contribute not a little, through the remembrance of his fiery acting, to the small houses attendant upon the older player.

Othello ranked among the best of Edmund Kean’s impersonations. The very year Kemble was heavily plodding through the lines in Dublin, Hazlitt was pronouncing the Othello of the wiry little dark-skinned wonder, “the highest effort of genius on the stage.” He may have looked too much the gypsy, and too little the soldierly Moor; he may have lacked imagination, and may have carried his character too often and too long pitched “in the highest key of passion;” yet his overwhelming energy and his burning vehemence gave extraordinary force to his scenes of jealousy. As for the latter part of the third act, that, said Hazlitt, was "a masterpiece of profound pathos and exquisite conception, and its effect on the house was electrical."

Even John Kemble in honesty had to say of Kean's Othello, "If the justness of its conception had been but equal to the brilliancy of execution, it would have been perfect." But naturally the stately actor thought the young man's fiery bursts were erroneous. "The whole thing is a mistake," he declared, "the fact being that Othello was a slow man."

OTHELLO AND IAGO.

(TO THE PRESENT DAY.)

IT seems strange that Kean's Iago never equalled in favor his Othello; for usually Kean was unsurpassable in picturing concealed hypocrisy. Moreover, his Ancient was original and unconventional, in that the customary "villain" of the stage was thrown to one side, and Iago was presented in an easy and natural vein.

Byron admired Kean's Iago. "Was not Iago perfection?" the poet wrote to Moore, "particularly the last look? I was close to him in the orchestra, and never saw an English countenance half so expressive." Hazlitt cried out in praising words, "The accomplished hypocrite was never perhaps so finely, so adroitly, portrayed,—a gay, light-hearted monster, a careless, cordial, comfortable villain."

These men genuinely admired the actor's work. For the fawning, pretending admirers, the hot-tempered son of wandering Nance Carey had his own method of punishment. He illustrated it with Raymond, the stage-manager of Drury Lane, who, at the rehearsals before Kean made his London début, had spoken discouraging and insulting words, but who after the player's success strove in every way to thrust flattery upon him.

"Come to my room," said the gypsy player, the night his Othello had been received with a thousand plaudits; "I have a fine hot punch for you."

He had it there, indeed, in a bowl of very generous size.

With smiles and bows the manager began another series of fulsome compliments, when Kean, fiercely interrupting him, exclaimed, "Look you, sir! now I'm drawing money to your treasury, you find out I'm a fine actor. You told me when I rehearsed Shylock it would be a failure. Then I was a poor man, without a friend, and you did your best to keep me down. Now you smother me with compliments. 'T is right I should make some return. Sir, to the devil with your fine speeches! Take that"—and the angry play-actor literally gave the manager the punch, bowl and all, throwing it over his head and body. "Now, sir, you can have satisfaction if you desire," cried the little man, as he promptly stripped off his coat and rolled up his sleeves.

But the manager deemed discretion the better part of valor, and declined the combat.

Few men could stand up before the wiry, undisciplined, impetuous actor, on or off the stage. All remembered the experience of Junius Brutus Booth when he came from Covent Garden to Drury Lane to test supremacy with the flashing actor whose look in tragedy, Southey declared, was like Michael Angelo's rebellious archangel, and whose matchless eyes could charm even while they excited. The future great leader of the American stage was fairly driven from his engagement by his complete defeat. The trial play was "Othello," with Booth as Iago, and Kean as the Moor. Barry Cornwall described the scene as it appeared to him:—

"Booth at first appeared to shrink from the combat. He eventually, however, overcame his fear, and went through the part of Iago manfully. But Kean!—no sooner did the interest of the story begin, and the passion of the part justify his fervor, than he seemed to expand from the small, quick, resolute figure which had previously been moving about the stage, and to assume the vigor and dimensions of a giant. He glared down upon the now diminutive Iago; he seized and tossed him aside with frightful and irresistible vehemence. Till then we had seen Othello and Iago as it were together; now the Moor seemed to occupy the stage alone. Up and down, to and fro, he went, facing about like the chased lion who has received his fatal hurt, but whose strength is still undiminished. The fury and whirlwind of the passions seemed to have endowed him with supernatural strength. His eye was glittering and bloodshot, his veins were swollen, and his whole figure restless and violent. It seemed dangerous to cross his path, and death to assault him. There is no doubt but that Kean was excited on this occasion in a most extraordinary degree, as much as though he had been maddened by wine. The impression which he made upon the audience has, perhaps, never been equalled in theatrical annals. Even the actors, hardened in their art, were moved. One comedian, a veteran of forty years' standing, told us that when Kean rushed off the stage in the third act, he (the narrator) felt all his face deluged in tears—a thing I give you my word, sir, that has not happened to me since I was a crack thus high.'"

Other critics said that "Kean had floored Booth, and walked over him completely." Booth himself, years later, speaking of his experience to the famous Falstaff, Hackett, declared "Kean's Othello smothered Desdemona and my Iago too."

Like his followers, Macready and Phelps, Kean had a good idea of the value of the "centre of the stage." One night he seemed to be playing Othello with more than usual intensity.

"You were great to-night," said a friend, as the two met on the street after the performance. "I never saw you so magnificent in the third act. I really thought you would have choked Iago, you seemed so tremendously in earnest."

"In earnest," repeated the tragedian, flushing up, "well, I should think so! Hang the fellow! he was trying to keep me out of the focus of the light!"

Bitterly could Kean fight his rivals, and yet honestly could he recognize their merits.

"How much longer must I act to the Iago of that Jesuit, Young," he exclaimed contemptuously, when appearing with one of the most gentlemanly and talented players of the time, and one, too, who could with rightfulness claim attention by the side of the great tragedian.

The two were to have alternated Othello and Iago during that exciting histrionic contest of 1822; but the impetuous Othello of the first night refused to give his finely formed, noble-voiced rival opportunity to play the Moor, as previously agreed. "No," cried Kean; "I would rather throw up my engagement. I had never seen Young act. Every one had told me he could not hold a farthing rushlight to me, but he can. He is an actor; and though I flatter myself he could not act "

Othello as well as I, yet what chance have I in Iago after him, with his confounded musical voice? I tell you what, Young is not only an actor such as I did not dream him to be, but he is a gentleman. Go to him; tell him, then, for me, that if he will allow me to keep Othello and Jaffier, I shall esteem it a personal obligation. Tell him he has made as great a hit in Iago as ever I did in Othello."

That Kean did wise to avoid the comparison is certain, even if Young was not great enough to "light up an era." The reality of Othello to the handsome gentleman's son was a remarkable indication of his high-strung sensibility as well as his nervous absorption of character. So genuine did the love and jealousy of Othello seem to Young, that, as he once told a friend, many a time after smothering his Desdemona he had flung himself upon the bed in a paroxysm of tearful remorse, from which he was aroused to a realization of its unreality by the thundering applause of the audience.

Kean and Young, during this engagement at Drury Lane, each received two hundred and fifty dollars a night. So great was the public interest that seats were sold six weeks in advance.

Macready, playing with Kean in the latter's declining years, could show only a fair degree of comparison. His looseness of figure rather suited the flexibility of the character, in the opinion of such an eminent critic as Hazlitt; but there were no massy movements in his action, no sweeping outlines to overwhelm the spectators. Moreover, there was an effeminate tone to his Moor, and an inclination to be "whimpering and lacrymose" in the pathetic passages. His Othello was an out-and-out negro, queerly dressed, irritable in his passion, and lacking grandeur in his agony.

That jealous actor, Fredericks, whom Macready had annoyed by dictatorial ways at rehearsal, declared with cynical scorn, when asked his opinion of the long-gowned, dark-painted star, "I have nothing to say about the man's acting; but he looked like an elderly negress of evil repute going to a fancy ball."

Yet in Paris the Frenchmen were so pleased with this Othello, that when they could not, by their plaudits, force him to accept a call, on account of a stringent police edict forbidding actors to appear before the curtain, they rushed into his dressing-room, dragged him, not unwilling, around to the auditorium, and then bodily lifted his tall form over the footlights, so that they might pay him the desired compliment, and yet keep within the letter of the law.

Macready's Iago was a success. When he played the part to Young as the Moor, the latter seemed to the auditors like a great humming-top, with Macready as the mischievous boy whipping it.

"Yes," growled one of the actors, "when Macready plays Othello he compels Iago to be nowhere, making the Ancient a mere stoker to feed fuel to the Moor's passion; but when Macready plays Iago, presto! it's all changed. Then Othello must be a mere puppet, a pipe for Iago to play upon." In other words, the shrewd actor turned every scene to his own advancement, whatever his character.

As for Charles Kean's Othello, he himself illustrated its difference from the Moor of his father by an anecdote he once told his fellow-actor, Herman Vezin. A gentleman called upon the younger Kean during a Liverpool engagement, and said, "I am going to see your Othello to-night, to compare it with your father's."

That night the actor, knowing the situation, played to the height of his ability. "What say you, sir?" he cried to his new acquaintance when they met the next day.

"Well, Mr. Kean," was the slow response, "I was very much pleased with your performance, very much, sir; but — you are not your father."

"That I know perfectly well," said the young man, smiling; "but to what difference do you particularly refer?"

"To this," continued the friendly critic; "your pathos, Mr. Kean, comes from here," placing his hand on his heart.

"Ah!" exclaimed Kean with pleasure, "you could hardly pay me a better compliment."

"But your father's pathos," quickly added the other gentleman, "that came from here," and he slapped the sole of his foot.

"He was right," declared Charles Kean emphatically, when narrating the anecdote to Vezin.

Nor did Samuel Phelps make his Othello or his Iago more than a creditable, painstaking performance. The Moor he showed so tender and pathetic as even to be tearful. Charles Dillon, too, constructed Othello in the same line of delineation; in fact, it was said that "he painted the character with such doting tenderness, and deplored the supposed betrayal of his love with such moderate resentment, that it was surprising he should have revenged it."

Fechter, in his flowing robes, worn with so much grace, formed a charming picture to the eye ; but his new reading of the play did not accord with the views of the critics. When, for example, he plunged hither and thither about the stage, until he had captured the fleeing Desdemona, and then, to make sure of her death, kneeled heavily upon the pillows he had piled upon her head ; and when, at the finish, he made a gesture as if to stab Iago, and then, as though suddenly changing his mind, turned the weapon upon himself,—he failed to find many ardent admirers of his interpretation of the scene. Macready wrote to Mrs. Pollock that the Frenchman's conception of Othello was shallow and melodramatic.

George Henry Lewes declared that not only was the conception unnatural, but that the execution was feeble ; while George Eliot, after seeing the performance, described it as lamentably bad, so deficient in the weight and passion necessary for deep tragedy as absolutely to degrade the representation.

In 1848 Gustavus V. Brooke made his London début, and on that occasion acted Othello better than he ever after interpreted the rôle. The stimulus of the first night aroused him to unusual vigor. The audience expressed unbounded enthusiasm, and even Macready's young friend Westland Marston admitted that, with the exception of Salvini, he had never seen an actor so powerful in the great third act. Marston, watching keenly the performance, noticed also with admiration the discriminating expression Brooke gave to the single word "fool" in its triple repetition in the line of the fifth act, "O fool ! fool ! fool !" The first time it was pronounced in blended amazement and remorse ; the second, with a slow, musing realization of his own wretched blindness to Iago's wiles : the third, with the mournful despair of a man who sees that the past is irrevocable.

GUSTAVUS V. BROOKE AS OTHELLO (In Act III., Scene 3).

Three years later, Dec. 15, 1851, Brooke bowed for the first time to an American audience at the Broadway Theatre, New York, and his character was Othello. At that time the Irish-born actor was in his thirty-third year, and with his fine figure and dignified bearing, combined with a sonorous voice and handsome face, could well depict the noble Moor. Fifteen years later, on board the ill-fated steamer London, while the waves swept over her deck, Brooke stood by the vessel, and, waving a courageous farewell to his comrades as they put off in their boat, remained with the ship till she sank in the depths of the Bay of Biscay.

In his boyhood days he had been a prodigy,—“The Hibernian Roscius;” but he had the wisdom to discard that title at the earliest opportunity. Many a story is told of his Othello, one of his best rôles. For example, when Forrest went to Manchester, England, the British players, knowing the pride that Brooke took in his own powerful voice, chaffed the sensitive actor immeasurably with the suggestion that the American player, who was noted for his tremendous lung-power, could utterly drown the voice of every one.

Brooke was put on his combative mettle. As Forrest in the character of Othello seized upon his Ancient in the great scene of the third act, and with magnificent force hurled his expletives against Iago, Brooke, utterly unmindful of the absurdity of his action, roared out in thunderous tones that completely drowned the strength of Forrest's voice, “O Grace! O Heaven, defend me!” Forrest was actually stupefied by the sudden explosion; it was the first time in his career that he had ever been over-matched in volume of tone. The audience was so astonished that it knew not whether to applaud or to hiss.

As brave as the hero he so often impersonated, Gustavus Brooke met his death in that stormy January of 1866. Under the terrible strain of the situation the actor's sister, who accompanied him, had died on board, and the brother would not leave the ship.

Day after day he had labored incessantly with the crew at the pumps. At last, when the men made ready on the 6th of January to put off from the steamer, on whose deck remained only the captain and the solitary passenger, they cried, "Come with us, Mr. Brooke!" But he stood composedly, yet sadly, leaning against the half-door of the companionway, resting his chin in his hands, upon the top of the door, and made answer, "No, my good fellows; no. Good-by. Give my last farewell to the people of Melbourne." A few minutes later and the London had passed out of their sight.

At Brighton, weeks afterwards, a bottle was picked up bearing the following message:—

"11th January, on board the London. We are just going down. No chance of safety. Please give this to Avonia Jones, Surrey Theatre.

GUSTAVUS VAUGHAN BROOKE."

Accompanying this was another note addressed to Warden, Belfast Theatre, and reading:—

"Do what you can for poor Avonia."

Poor Avonia, the actress who had accompanied him on his last tour, and had become his wife, died a year afterwards in New York.

Now, to turn to those actors who are esteemed as absolutely American. I have spoken of the elder Booth's experience as Iago in London, and the impetuous force he gave the character of his Othello. Booth's son Edwin has said that when his father was going to act the part he would often wear a crescent pin on his breast all day, in order to keep himself imbued with his character, or would mumble over the words of the Koran; and on one occasion he even invited a travelling band of Arabic jugglers to visit his home in Baltimore on the day he was to act the Moor.

But his Iago became, as did the Ancient of his son in after years, a character of triumph. In that fifth act, when Othello is really the centre of the scene, Junius Brutus Booth could so picture in his face, with but a few lines of text to assist in calling attention, the terrible passions of the entrapped villain, as fairly to fascinate the eye of the spectators, and lead them to overwhelming applause. "The secret working of Iago's mind flashed in those powerful eyes," declared one who noticed this extraordinary effect, and sought to picture it ; “the face reddened with suppressed rage, then turned livid with hate ; and the bitter intensity with which he expressed the lines,— ‘Demand me nothing ; what you know, you know ;

From this time forth I never will speak word,’ was marvellous. During the remainder of the scene his countenance revealed what the tongue disdained to speak, and retained its magnetic influence upon the beholders until the final exit.”

Many a time Booth’s indulgences in drink drove him to strange proceedings, yet apparently his power of acting never suffered thereby, although sometimes his engagements barely escaped cancellation.

At Providence, for example, one night just as the curtain was to rise on “Othello,” our Iago was nowhere to be found. They sent to his hotel ; he was not there.

“I’ll find him,” declared a gentleman in one of the boxes, who knew Booth’s proclivities ; and off he started for the low haunts of the town. There, sure enough, in Morris Deming’s cheap sailor boarding-house they found the great actor in high glee drinking deep cups with mine host,—“a learned Theban, a sage philosopher,” as Booth persisted in calling his associate at the table.

Dragged back to the theatre, the marvellous actor became sobered at once, and played superbly.

After another performance of "Othello" at Charleston, S.C., in 1837, Booth, indulging heavily in drink with his room-mate, Tom Flynn, became convinced that Flynn was Iago, and, seizing him by the throat, cried out the words of the text, "Villain, be sure thou prove my love a wanton," as he hurled him to the floor.

This was too much for Flynn, equally under the influence of liquor, and in self-defence the temporary Iago seized a fire-poker, brought it across Booth's face with a tremendous thud, and stopped the scene then and there. The result of the encounter was the broken nose which ever after marred the handsome face of the actor.

It was in the character of Othello that Forrest made his first appearance on that stage where he established his fame as a tragedian,—the Bowery. The night was Nov. 6, 1826; the Iago was Mr. Duff; the Desdemona, Mrs. Hughes. The frank, bright-faced youth, just passing his twentieth year, had finished his hard novitiate, and with a year's engagement at twenty-eight dollars a week felt happy and secure. But even better times were already at hand. With a characteristic oath his old manager had declared, on the night the youth played Othello at the Park Theatre at a benefit performance just before his appearance at the Bowery, "The boy has made a hit."

That, however, was nothing compared with the impression Forrest made in the same character a few days later at the famous New York home of tragedy. The audience fairly went wild over his acting. Gilfert, the manager, at once, after the night of "Othello," raised the actor's pay to forty dollars a week. To be sure, a little later the same shrewd Gilfert was loaning Forrest's services to other theatres for two hundred dollars a night,—pocketing the difference between the large sum and the stipulated salary of the player; but this reacted to Forrest's benefit, since, at the end of the season, he was in a position to demand, and secure, another contract in which the figures were placed at the sum Gilfert had been charging others,—two hundred dollars for each performance.

Just before the New York engagement Forrest had played second to Edmund Kean during an Albany performance, and into his Iago introduced business that astonished the English star. Previous to that day Iago had been pictured as a gloomy, sullen scoundrel whose villainy was apparent to all.

Forrest gave him the light, airy dash and genuine hypocrisy of the seemingly "honest Ancient." As he repeated the lines,—

"Look to your wife ; observe her well with Cassio ; Wear your eye thus, not jealous, — nor secure,"

he spoke all but the last two words in an off-hand, easy way, but into that final suggestion, by dropping his high-pitched tones swiftly into a husky whisper, he threw such a mass of evil suspicion and fearful impression as to nerve even Kean to responsive acting more magnificent than usual, and to bring from the audience a tremendous storm of applause.

"Where did you get that idea, my boy?" cried Kean excitedly, as the two met in the green-room.

"It is my own conception," replied Forrest.

"It is great," declared the elder tragedian, "and every actor from this day will have to speak the lines as you spoke them."

As Othello, it is said that Forrest's utterance of the lines,—

"Silence that dreadful bell; it frights the isle
From her propriety," was actually bell-like in the tone he gave it, and, like all his utterances, was melodic without harshness. Moreover, the exaggerated force he gave to the first two words in the expression, "'Twas I that killed her" (the "I" being unduly prolonged, and accompanied by a stout thumping of the breast), was declared by John Foster Kirk to be a notable feature, not easily forgotten.

James Rees often stood in the wings when his friend played the Moor, and after the performance never failed to allude, with constantly increasing admiration, to two points. The first was the expression of great mental strife as the husband of Desdemona uttered the words, "Oh! now forever farewell the tranquil mind! farewell content! . . . Othello's occupation's gone." The actor's form lost its strength and vigor; the arms hung powerless by his side; his very reason, said Rees, seemed palsied, as if the spirit of life was drooping away with each word. The second point was the tragedian's rendering of the scene following the passage, "I had rather be a toad, and live upon the vapor of a dungeon." As the full conviction of Desdemona's guilt burst upon him, the actor became tremendously forcible, even terrific, in vocal expression and physical action.

Artemus Ward saw Forrest as the Moor. "He is a grate actor," declared the humorist. "I thot I saw Otheller before me all the time he was actin ; and when the curtain fell I found my spectacles was still mistened with saltwater which had run from my eyes while poor Desdemony was a-dyin. Betsy Jane, Betsy Jane ! let us pray that our domestic bliss may never be busted by a Iago. Edwin Forrest makes money actin out on the stage. He gits five hundred dollars a nite, and his board and washin. I wish I had such a Forrest in my garding ! ”

The lines of Othello were the last to pass the lips of Forrest before the public. On the 7th of December, 1872, at Tremont Temple, Boston, he appeared, as a reader, for the last time before an audience, giving selections from the tragedy. Five days later he was dead.

E. L. Davenport, who could dance the hornpipe and play Hamlet the same evening, made an admirable Othello. The Oriental scimitar hung at his side, while ponderous robes and surmounting turban formed his garb,—a dress never changed from the early scenes in Venice to the tragic chamber in Cyprus. But yet he played so strongly that careless costuming was forgotten in enjoyment of the grand force with which he drove on to the climax. It was not the passion-swayed Moor of

E. L. DAVENPORT AS OTHELLO (In Act I., Scene 2).

Salvini, the Eastern love-poem of Edwin Booth, the honest, direct-dealing, but sadly tortured man of Barrett; but a modern American, full of fire and executive ability, to whom love and jealousy were merely episodes to be met and dealt with as an ordinary experience, and who, by some unwonted juggling, found himself called upon to marry a romantic belle of the Adriatic, conquer the Ottomites, restore a warlike isle to the ways of peace, and thus to meet and deal with unlooked for domestic difficulties. To him all was simply the decree of fate, to which he bowed with resignation, until the murder of Desdemona awoke him; then suicide was found to be the only relief.

It was some sixty years ago (1837) that Edward Loomis Davenport, as a member of the Tremont Theatre company of Boston, became a recognized stock actor. Previous to that date he had made his début at Providence, where he played a few small parts, and where, among other rôles, he was cast for William in "Black-eyed Susan," a promising performance of which led to the home engagement. From that time for exactly forty years Mr. Davenport was the most active figure in the dramatic annals of the American stage. Seven of the forty were spent in England, whither he accompanied Anna Cora Mowatt as leading support. This visit won for him much fame but little wealth; a fate destined to follow him to 1877, when he died in Canton, Pa., after having toiled for twoscore years to find his accumulations represented by a mortgaged farm and a large but undesirable wardrobe. He played a number and a range of parts that were astonishing, and he played them well. Beginning with Parson Willdo, he closed with Daniel Druce, and, with the exception of King Lear, hesitated at nothing. Henry in "Speed the Plough" one night, Othello the next; Sir Benjamin Backbite on Monday, Brutus on Tuesday; Rolando at 7.30, Bill Sykes at 9,—were actual experiences.

Of Rossi in Othello, the Gazette de France declared that in the senate scene he conquered as much by his cleverness as by his heart, and in illustration of this point thus compared the actor's interpretation of the scene with that of Salvini: "Salvini advances quietly, nobly; respecting the father's grief, but sure of the justice of his own claim, he pleads the cause of his love. He pleads it without moving a step, standing a short distance from the council. His hand, by an oratorical movement from time to time, barely emphasizes his speech, which is imbued with the serenity of a proud conscience. To his face, his eyes, his lips, is intrusted the task of forcing conviction upon the mind of his judges, or rather it is these features which finish and complete the work of his words. To attain such a dramatic result with such a studied sobriety of means is a marvel to which we have long been unaccustomed. M. Rossi, who is nevertheless very fine, played this scene in exactly the opposite manner. While he argued, his gestures added the force of pantomime to his words; whilst he went on talking, he walked to and fro: there was no lack of nobility in his Othello, but there were also dexterity and subtlety. The Moor, although commander-in-chief and first soldier of the Republic of Venice, does not lose sight of the fact that he stands before a council of inflexible patricians, and that these patricians may easily refuse to admit the defence of love by divine right. Thus Rossi's Othello deemed it necessary at moments to summon to his aid a smile, irony, familiarity, affected simplicity. Othello, as enacted by Salvini, despairs these subtleties; he does not even think of such fears, which he doubtless would consider unworthy of him."

McCullough, in the manly tenderness, simplicity, and yet underlying vehemence of passion, was pronounced well nigh perfect by studious critics who could at the same time admit that there was something a little fantastic in the facial style this actor used, and a blemish in the display of a wild beast's head on the back of one of Othello's robes.

There were touches of fresh and aptly illustrative business in the encounter of Othello and Iago in the great scene of the third act. As was said by his friend, Mr. Winter, "The gasping struggles of Iago heightened the effect of the Moor's fury, and the quickly suppressed impulse and yell of rage with which he finally bounded away made an admirable effect of nature." McCullough's final scene was likened to a solemn act of sacrifice, a deed of justice rather than of barbaric murder, impressing awe instead of horror upon the audience.

And now let us glance at a group of three actors, of whom the centre figure is Edwin Booth. With Tommaso Salvini and with Lawrence Barrett, Mr. Booth in different seasons alternated the leading rôles of the tragedy. His own Iago was absolutely fascinating in its suggestiveness of satanic wickedness, and in its airy shrewdness of deception. The keen, subtle plotting of the Ancient, as developed by the American leader, was full of cunning and of intellectual power. It was an inward, spiritual interpretation as compared with the outward, animal interpretation of Othello by the great Italian actor.

TOMMASO SALVINI AS OTHELLO.

Salvini's Othello thrusts aside the nobler inclinations of the soul for the vigorous inclinations of the barbaric senses, and dropping the poetic side of this brave warrior, this hero who could win the tender love of Desdemona and the affection of Cassio, places more prominent the magnificent but brutal side of the soldier, whose anger is fearful and whose vengeance is terrible. For this rôle nature has admirably adapted Signor Salvini, with his grand physique and robust voice. In the scene wherein Othello parts the two combatants, Cassio and Montano, all of the vital energy of the Moor is brought out; there is less of pain and of grief at the fall of his favorite lieutenant than of terrible anger at the disgraceful proceedings. Othello's face flames with passion, and his eyes flash ominously from one rioter to the other. Finally, as he degrades Cassio, there is seen nothing of profound regret, but all of stern anger.

In the grand scene of the third act, Salvini's Othello, with visage distorted by rage, and with seeming unconsciousness of what he is doing, forces Iago to his knees, and then hurls him to the ground, and tramples upon the prostrate form, only suddenly to stop his wrath with the impulse of a quieting thought, stand a while sadly motionless, and then, reaching forth his hand, gently assist his Ancient to rise. Again, in contrast, comes that fearful burst of the final act, when like a tiger he rushes down upon the tender Desdemona, then strides away, then returns with rolling eyes and panting breast to bear her away to death. And last of all, his own death,—it is butchery! Drawing the terrible scimitar swiftly across his throat, and slashing horribly, he dies—not like a soldier of Venice, but like an insane barbarian.

The powerful actor would always carry an audience with him by the very force of his colossal physique,—and one night he literally carried a brother actor by the same force. It was at Bologna, when Salvini was acting Othello for the first time in that city. The Iago, Signor Piccinini, a man of great size and strength, persisted at rehearsal in placing himself on the wrong side of the stage in the notable scene of the third act. Quietly and politely Salvini requested his subordinate to take the other side at the regular performance, and Piccinini sullenly consented.

“I don’t see that it makes any difference,” declared the supporting actor in a grumbling tone, “but I suppose I can do it if you want it.”

“Suppose!” exclaimed Salvini. “Sir, there is no suppose in the matter. You will be there!”

But that night the still surly Iago deliberately placed himself upon the wrong side.

Instantly Salvini stopped in his part. Swiftly turning, he bounded over to the six-foot Iago, and seizing the giant around the waist, bore him, struggling in the air, across the stage to the desired spot, with the audible exclamation, “Now, sir, stay there!”

And he did stay there, while the audience, astonished, amused, and really delighted at the exhibition of strength, loudly applauded.

From that night on Piccinini and Salvini were the best of friends.

Of Salvini’s necessity for working himself up to the crucial point, an interesting story was once narrated by Jules Clarétie. A party of friends one night asked the actor to recite the last monologue of Othello. Acquiescing, he rose, and in magnificent voice began. But before he had completed a half-dozen lines Salvini suddenly stopped, and with a gesture of despair exclaimed, “No, it is impossible! I am not in the situation. I am not prepared for this supreme anguish. In order to render the frantic despair of Othello, I need to have passed through all his tortures; I need to have played the whole part. But to enter thus the soul of the character, without having gradually penetrated into it, I cannot—it is impossible!" All this was said without any affectation, but with the air of a man who reveals the secret of his power.

Booth's Othello was a warm, passionate, and yet noble husband and soldier. In scenes of oratorical display, as in the tale before the Duke, there were not the equal eloquence and rich grandeur of speech that marked, for example, Lawrence Barrett's portrayal; but in moments of impressiveness, such as the declaration of faith in Desdemona, and the dismissal of Cassio, Booth showed exceeding power.

Mr. Barrett's Othello was a dignified but not overawing Moor,—a man who attracted the sympathy by reason of his manifestations of noble nature. The hot fire of jealousy was shown consuming the victim, and arousing pity by its causing pain. His Othello was full of sighs,—sharp-turned sighs of joy, long-drawn sighs of anger, staccato sighs of mental anguish. His Moor appeared so wronged as to temper the effect of all his acts of cruelty, and make him as great a martyr, to the spectators, as was Desdemona. Barrett's Iago was real and plausible, thoroughly "honest" in appearance both to the audience and to Othello: yet it lacked the fascination of the subtle creation; it never gleamed like the serpent's eye, brilliant and deadly.

Few Americans will forget the shock that ran through the country on the 4th of April, 1889, when it was announced in the press that on the previous night at the theatre in Rochester, N. Y., Edwin Booth had been suddenly stricken with paralysis, while struggling through the second act of "Othello." Mr. Barrett, coming before the curtain, said to the silent audience, "We fear that this is the beginning of the end. The world has probably heard for the last time the greatest actor who speaks the English language. The play cannot go on."

Fortunately the fears of Mr. Barrett were not realized, for Mr. Booth after a few days' rest returned to the stage.

The neatest and clearest description, in one paragraph, of Booth's Iago that I have ever seen was that given by William Winter when he spoke of the characterization being marked by "lithe, clear, rapier-like elasticity, both physical and mental, and by a cool, sardonic, veiled, involuntary, cruel humor, which was made to play like a lambent flame of hell over the whole structure of the work."

When Mr. Booth visited England, in 1880, and met with such ill-success at the poorly equipped Princess's Theatre,—a house devoted to melodrama, and utterly unsuitable for the appearance of America's most refined and polished actor,—he was invited to appear with Henry Irving at the latter's grandly furnished Lyceum Theatre. There, on May 2, 1881, "Othello" was produced, with Booth in the title rôle, and Irving as Iago; the next week the characters were reversed. The talented Ellen Terry, in her snow-white robes, so symbolic of the purity of the heroine, made a lovely, pathetic Desdemona.

But even there and then the English critics refused to give full honor to the American star. One or two were rough-handed enough to assert that Booth's "make-up suggested at times an Indian juggler, while about the head he seemed a low-caste Bengali," and that "he had a tendency at times to gobble like a turkey;" but they all had to admit that his jealousy scenes with Iago and with Desdemona were of highest artistic order.

Irving's tall, dark — but not black — Othello, in long flowing robe and little white turban, was romantic in coloring and tender in character; but yet the critics who oppose his delineation have declared that Desdemona had no reason for loving or sympathizing with such a "jerky, fidgety, and undignified Othello," while his light-toned Iago was declared by many as more stormy than shrewd.

When Irving thus appeared with Booth, it was his very first impersonation of Iago. Undoubtedly it was clear-cut and picturesque; certainly it was gay in its banter. By a curious coincidence, in this first appearance in union with Booth, the English actor chanced upon a method of interpretation in the street scene that was exactly the same which the American had originated and presented for the first time in the history of the tragedy. The London critics, having never seen this act so played, called it a novelty. After Cassio is attacked by Roderigo, and after the latter is slain, the wounded lieutenant lies in the dark, silent street alone with the treacherous Ancient. Bending over the wounded man, Iago looks to see his condition, and at that moment is suddenly struck with the thought how easily he can rid himself of the man, and no one be the wiser. He raises his sword to strike—but just at that moment the voices and hurrying feet of people are heard, and the treacherous villain is perforce obliged to drop his weapon and assume a different mien.

Wilson Barrett naturally gave to his Othello a score of novelties. His swarthy hero, with fierce peaked beard and bristling mustache, roused to jealous madness by Iago's intimations, hurled the Ancient across the chamber, and with eyes glaring as if demented, hacked fiercely with his scimitar at the portrait of Desdemona. In the death scene he grasped his wife in his arms, threw her bodily upon the bed, and behind the curtains smothered her to death. Then for his own destruction he drove a short sword into his breast. The curtain fell with Barrett leaning against the bed, and holding to his dark throat the white hand of Desdemona.

"The African Tragedian," Ira Aldridge, whose coal-black face was often seen in the character of Othello, won fame in two continents. Born in Maryland in 1804, he turned to the stage, making his début in New York as Rolla, and then playing, in an extensive répertoire, Shylock and Othello, as well as Zanga, Mungo, Hassan, and Gambria, in England and Russia, Prussia, Austria, Switzerland, Turkey, and other countries, winning medal after medal from European potentates, and gaining a commendatory letter even from Edmund Kean.

His tragic acting was always marked by a solemn intensity; but occasionally he would burst forth into a show of fierce passion, made more effective by the very darkness of his face. Nor was he averse to comic parts, and his broad grin and shining eyes were often utilized for the lighter rôles. He was originally intended for the church.

A few women have attempted Iago on the English stage in years gone by; while in America Charlotte Crampton, Mrs. D. W. Waller, and Marie Prescott have essayed the rôle.

LEAR.

---

OCCASIONALLY in these modern days we find a Le Beau in "As You Like It" who delights to disobey the injunction of his dramatic author by forcing a joke into the wrestling scene, crying to the Duke when he inquires the condition of Charles, "He says he cannot speak, my lord;" but a "bull" of better merit was unconsciously illustrated years ago in a provincial theatre while "Lear" was being performed.

The regular impersonator of Gloucester had been suddenly taken ill, and a substitute was therefore hurriedly secured. Our temporary player succeeded in committing to memory all the words of his part up to the scene where he has his eyes put out, but from there on the sightless Earl had to beg the permission of the audience to read his lines!

The country player, however, need not have felt the situation with any keenness, since in caring little for the audience he had a good example in his great predecessor, Garrick, if the gossip of the old actors is correct. Tom King used to say that the night the famous Roscius drowned the audience with tears at his pathetic portrayal in the great fourth act of "Lear," and even while the enthusiastic pit-tites were leaping on their benches to cheer his acting, the self-possessed player thrust his tongue into his cheek, as he turned to King with the words, "Hang me, Tom! it will do; it will do." And yet Garrick could throw such wonderful power into his mimic life, that Jack Bannister, hardened actor though he was, standing in the wings, was absolutely thrilled by the utterance of the words, "O fool, I shall go mad." "Why," cried Bannister, "in Lear, Garrick's very stick acted!" The scene with Cordelia and the physician was the most pathetic the brother player ever saw.

Sharp-tongued Kitty Clive, as we know, liked to plague the great little actor with personal torments that only a hot-tempered woman could invent; but one night she too was carried away by Garrick's Lear. Katherine had gone to the wings on purpose to find some way for disconcerting the player; but, listening to his words, she gradually found herself absorbed in his acting, and finally was so overwhelmed by his marvellous power that, with uncontrollable tears in her eyes, and with spiteful anger in her heart at her own subjection, she flounced away to the green-room, muttering, "Hang that man! I verily believe he could act a gridiron!"

A strange-looking Lear would the great Davy seem if he could step upon our stage to-day. Imagine the ancient King of Britain clothed in a long-cut court dress of the eighteenth century, with lace cravat, ruffled wrists, and gold-braid adornments; while silk stockings and buckled shoes help complete the attire. In fact, Garrick might just as well have worn his Lear costume in a comedy. The author of "The Actor" hits this point as he thus describes the famous man's Lear (for Fondlewife is the aged uxorious husband in the comedy of "The Old Bachelor") : "When we see the little old white-haired man enter, with spindleshanks, a tottering gait, and great shoes upon the little feet, we fancy a Gomez or a Fondlewife; but when he speaks we find him every inch a king."

Feeble though he was in movement, with slow and languid steps, Garrick yet retained absolutely the air of royalty. It seemed as if misery was painted in every line of his face; and the pathetic, sorrowful way in which he fixed his eyes slowly and with difficulty upon each person before addressing him, told, with the expression of the face, the sad significance of the old King's misery even before a word was uttered. Garrick wore no beard in Lear, nor did Kemble after him. In fact, Macready was the first player to give the King a beard.

Those were exciting nights when Garrick depicted the brain-wrecked monarch; since the impetuous actor sought rivalry again, as he had in Romeo, with handsome, dashing Spranger Barry, the delight of the ladies on and off the stage. As for David at that time, "off the stage," said his enemy Murphy, "he was a mean, sneaking little fellow. But on the stage,"—and here, according to report, Murphy threw up his hands and eyes as he cried in ecstasy, "Oh, my great God!" Friend and foe were compelled thus to acknowledge the histrionic power of the stage-drawn wine-merchant.

It was this same Murphy who, in the wings, tried his utmost to disconcert Garrick while the latter was acting Lear, by talking in no indistinct tone with old Sam Johnson. Garrick, rightfully annoyed at this, exclaimed as he made his exit, "You two talk so loud you destroy my feelings!" upon which, irate Johnson, with contemptuous and contemptible reference to the actor's calling, responded, "Punch has no feelings."

For the rival Lears the public made these versified epigrams :—

“The town has found out different ways
To praise its different Lears ;
To Barry it gives loud huzzas,
To Garrick — only tears.”

“A king — Ay, every inch a king,
Such Barry doth appear ;
But Garrick’s quite another thing ;
He’s every inch King Lear.”

Tall and majestic, Barry won the eye in opposition to little Garrick, as a verse of the day, in harsh contrast, indicated :—

“When kingly Barry acts, the boxes ring
With echoing praise, ‘Ay, every inch a king !’
When Garrick dwindling whines, the assenting house
Re-whispers aptly back, ‘A mouse! a mouse!’ ”

But Barry, even with his silver voice, could not equal the passion and variety of Garrick’s tones, nor could his great dignity in the rôle have such effect as the slow-moving, feeble, affecting Lear of the natural-born actor, his rival. The latter, too, excelled in emotional strength. When Garrick delivered the curse, cried Davies, the audience seemed to shrink from it as from a flash of lightning. Not even the unlucky tumbling off of his crown of straw could provoke a smile from the audience when Garrick met with the accident, though such a ludicrous misfortune with a lesser actor would have ruined the scene.

One night when Garrick, throwing away his mantle and kneeling in his own impressive way, repeated the curse, while he clasped his hands and solemnly raised his eyes to heaven, the front row in the audience swiftly and spontaneously stood up to see him clearly. The second row, unwilling to lose the slightest portion of the scene, followed the movement, and then, as if by tacit understanding that no remonstrance should break the continuity of the acting, the whole pit silently rose to witness the grand, overpowering imprecation.

An odd trick shrewd Davy employed to cap his triumph over Barry. Being of small size, and therefore easily transportable, he would fall into a stage sleep in the character, and in that condition be borne gracefully from the stage, giving a scene impossible for his rival, "because he knew that Barry, on account of his size, could not be carried off the stage with the same ease that he could."

The veteran actor of the last century, O'Keefe, maintained that he liked Garrick best of all in Lear. No heart, he said, could fail to be touched by the pitiable climax of Garrick's cry, "I will do such things—what they are I know not," followed by the sudden recollection of his own lack of power. It was O'Keefe who declared, "The simplicity of his saying, 'Be these tears wet?—yes, faith!' putting his finger to the cheek of Cordelia, and then looking at his finger, was exquisite." And as Lear and Cordelia, Garrick and Mrs. Cibber are both said actually to have worked themselves up to the shedding of tears, showing that the actor who could glory over his effect upon the audience could occasionally, at least, himself be overcome by Shakespeare's genius. One cool old critic, however, not only thought this was bathos, but also commented on the anachronism of the handkerchief so frequently used by Garrick in the act. ✓

Frankly, it must have been hard work for Garrick to keep the illusion in his mind on that night when gay Peg Woffington enjoyed, and probably returned, an unexpected salutation from an ardent play-goer. In the very midst of the scene wherein Lear, lying with his head in Cordelia's lap, recovers from his delirium, up to the stage leaps a gentleman from the audience, to clasp pretty Cordelia in his arms, and impress upon her lips a hearty kiss. And the spectators, as well as Peggy, seemed to enjoy the unexpected amendment to the drama.

The wits played in words on Garrick's well-known jealousy of Barry, by eulogizing the latter actor in the following double-turned lines:—

“Critics, attend! and judge the rival Lear,
While each commands applause, and each your tears.
Then own this truth—well he performs his part
Who touches even Garrick to the heart.”

The first time our hero played Lear was at Goodman's Fields on the night of March 18, 1742. It was his initial season on the stage, his début having been made in the same humble theatre on the 19th of the preceding October. The last time he played the rôle was on the 8th of June, 1776, the evening before his farewell to the stage. In fact, “Lear” was his final theatrical tragedy, since it was in comedy he chose to say, “Good-by forever.” At that eventful performance of the play Miss Younge (afterwards Mrs. Pope) was the Cordelia; and Garrick, holding her hand tightly clasped in his as they walked to the green-room after the fall of the last curtain, exclaimed in sad reflection, “Ah, Bessie! this is the last time I shall ever be your father on the stage.” So sad and solemn were his words, that the actress, moved by emotion, dropped on her knees at his feet, and raised her tearful eyes to his, to ask a father's blessing.

Mr. Garrick as King Lear.

DAVID GARRICK AS KING LEAR (In Act III., Scene I.).

Until 1756 Garrick had played in Nahum Tate's adaptation of the tragedy; in that year he restored a part of the original Shakespearian version. Tate's "Lear" held prominence on the stage from 1681 down to Macready's day, no one daring before Macready to do away utterly with the contemptible interpolations of that poet laureate who, before he obtained the latter honor, had found in Shakespeare's "Lear" only "an obscure piece recommended to his notice by a friend," — a piece which on his examination proved a "heap of jewels unstrung and unpolished."

In the beginning of the Shakespearian tragedy, Dec. 26, 1606, when "Lear" was played by "His Majesty's servants," before the King at Whitehall, upon St. Stephen's night in the Christmas holidays, Richard Burbage, presumably, was the Lear; and possibly Joseph Taylor was the original Edgar, although Davies is the only one to suggest the latter impersonation. As for Burbage, the original of nearly a dozen of Shakespeare's heroes, his King is thus mentioned in an old elegy: —

"Thy stature small, but every thought and mood
Might thoroughly from thy face be understood.
And his whole action he could change with ease
From ancient Leare to youthful Pericles."

The great Betterton was probably the Lear after the Restoration; but though much has been found in the old-time records concerning his Othello, his Hamlet, and his Macbeth, no description of his Lear has been handed down. Doubtless the tragedy enjoyed far less favor than other works, and its impersonators were thus less considered. For nearly a score of years after Betterton's probable appearance in the title rôle, the play slept in the theatre's archives. Then, indeed, when it was revived, in 1681, it was so altered that its author would have most grievously condemned it could he have been present on the opening night. But Nahum Tate thought—nay, knew—that his own work, in adaptation, made the drama; for did he not set himself down on the title-page of another play as “the author of the tragedy called ‘King Lear’!”

Such a wretched, mangled, inartistic mess of master-work and apprentice jobbery! The Fool was taken bodily out of the play (perhaps, suggested Campbell, because Tate “wished to have no other fool than himself concerned with the tragedy”), and never again returned until Macready, with fear and trembling, restored the character. Even Garrick, who had thought of bringing back the Fool, and had found Woodward ready to promise that in the acting of the character he would conservatively “be very chaste in his coloring, and not counteract the agonies of Lear,” lost his courage before the performance, and followed Tate closely in this and many other ways; while John Kemble and Edmund Kean, though turning in part from Garrick’s tracks, yet still feared the restoration of the banished court wit.

More yet did worthy Tate. In his wish “to rectify,” as he said, “what was wanting in the regularity and probability of the tale,” he wove in a love-thread between Edgar and Cordelia, and, to heighten the romantic effect, had Cordelia bravely rescued by her lover from two fierce ruffians who sought to earn their gold from Edmund by attacking the sweet daughter of the old King.

What the noble and dignified Elizabeth Barry, as the first Cordelia of this version, thought of the introduced love episode we know not; but from her customary solemn acting in the tragic rôles we may assume she took very unkindly to the innovation.

As for Betterton, he found himself condemned to mangle in many ways the lines he once had spoken so faithfully for his author. The great speech in the second act not being deemed sufficiently strong by Tate, the new Lear was obliged to cry out at the end:—

“ Blood! Fire! here — Leprosies and bluest plagues!
Room, room for Hell to belch her horrors up,
And drench the Circes in a stream of fire.
Hark, how the Infernals echo to my rage
Their whips and snakes!”

To prove unquestionably that he was the “hero” of the play, Betterton, though supposed, as Lear, to be near eighty years of age, and totally unarmed, was made to cope so vigorously with four wicked murderers as to win a victory over all of them in bloody hand-to-hand conflict.

And then, having placed all the tragic scenes he could invent in the middle of the play, Mr. Tate proceeds to end all with a merry adjustment, the entire last act being changed to give the good people of the play a happy settlement and prediction of a glorious future,—Lear restored to the throne, and Edgar and Cordelia married.

Thus it was that Mrs. Bracegirdle and the beautiful Mrs. Booth nightly ended their parts upon the stage; while the “inimitably expressive” Barton Booth as Lear “rendered the character more amiable, or, to speak critically, less terrible, than Garrick.” This says Davies. But Theophilus Cibber has a stronger word for Booth's Lear. "Never," says the spendthrift actor-manager, "did pity or terror more vehemently possess an audience than by his judicial and powerful execution of that part."

That the well-born tragedian could delight in aged rôles was natural, since it was the curious chance of a gray-haired character that brought him into glory. He was cast for the title rôle in Addison's "Cato;" but the managers, failing to foresee the future of the play, feared so much that the young man would decline to impersonate a venerable character, that they took unmeasured pains to coax him into accepting it. Shrewd Barton, however, in a casual glance at the manuscript, saw the possibilities of the rôle, and, keeping his own secret, pretended to be indifferent to the part, while at the same time at home he zealously and confidently prepared himself for the opening night.

That night he fairly swept the house before him. Lord Bolingbroke not only collected a purse of one hundred guineas from his box-party to thrust into the actor's hand, but also started a movement to let the successful player into partnership in the management of the theatre. When jealous enemies sought to break down this friendship by keeping the actor busy with a part every night upon the stage, they simply fanned the fuel; for Booth immediately after each performance was whisked away in the carriage of some nobleman, to be entertained lavishly until the hour of the next performance. He acquired a share of the management. He married the pretty ballet-dancer, Miss Santlow, who became the Cordelia of his Lear. But at the age of forty-six the dissipations of his gay life compelled his retirement from the stage; and the subsequent bleeding, blistering, and dosing of a quack, with his prescriptions of two pounds of crude mercury, ended his life in 1733.

Two Lears appeared between Booth and Garrick,—Antony Boheme, the ex-sailor, who, with his exalted bearing, rich voice, and expressive features, made an admirable King; and Quin, who, excellent actor though he was, so neglected the rehearsals that in the ineffectual performance he nearly lost the favor of the public.

Then came the Garrick-Barry rivalry at Drury Lane and Covent Garden.

“What man like Barry with such pains can err,
In elocution, action, character?
What man could give, if Barry were not here,
Such well-applauded tenderness to Lear?
Who else could speak so very, very fine,
That sense may kindly end with every line? ”

So sung the usually bitter Churchill in The Rosciad. But though Barry conquered in the contest of Romeos, as Lear his opponent carried off the honors. The tall, graceful, manly fellow, whose acting was studied by great Parliamentary leaders in order that they might from him learn how to stand and move and gesture with combined charm and stateliness, could present in Lear marked dignity and a venerable bearing, and could utter the terrible imprecation with impressive elocution; but he failed to give that variety of expression to the voice, and that awe-inspiring tone to the whole character, which the mobile-featured, emotional Garrick could present. Barry had an odd habit of pausing between his words that, carried to an extreme in Lear, proved wearisome in its artifice.

There was no question, however, regarding the effectiveness of Mrs. Barry's Cordelia. When she raised to heaven her large eyes, glistening with tears, said an old critic, and stood speechless, wringing her hands, it seemed as if she could claim "the aureole of a saint." "It is the grandest thing of the kind I have ever seen an actress do," the old play-goer cries in ecstasy; "my fancy still feeds on it, and the recollections of it will go with me to my grave."

Though Barry was a talented man he was also very modest. Oftentimes, at rehearsal, he would call aside the veteran stage carpenter, who in his day had seen so many giants of the stage act Shakespeare's rôles, and seriously consult with him on the most effective way to better the impersonation. John O'Keefe, the actor-dramatist, who praised this trait in Barry's character, liked to tell, also, to his friends of the stage about the performance of "Lear" in which he temporarily assumed the duties of a "dresser," or actor's assistant. His friend Spranger asked him to exercise his reported skill in drawing, by making up Lear's face for that performance. So O'Keefe with camel's-hair pencil and India ink drew the wrinkles of care and age over the smooth cheeks and forehead of the player until, to his mind, the countenance was most venerable. No sooner had Barry entered the green-room, however, than the jolly fat Isaac Sparks, chief joker of the assembly, broke out, "Hallo, Barry! What's this? Oh, I see! You belong to the London Beefsteak Club, and so O'Keefe has made you peeping through a gridiron."

O'Keefe enjoyed as well the telling of Henry Mossop's experience in Lear. It was during a season when the actor was also a manager, and when the treasury was so low that “the ghost did not always walk.” A wily actor, playing Kent, supported the afflicted Lear in his arms securely enough, to all appearances, beyond the footlights; but, as he gradually loosened and loosened his hold, he was whispering in Mossop’s ear, “Give me your word, sir, that you’ll pay me my arrears to-night before I go home, or I’ll let you drop on the floor.”

“Don’t talk to me now, you villain,” hoarsely returned Mossop, alarmed at the threat, but still more alarmed at the prospect of having his scene ruined. “Go on with the part; go on!”

“No,” responded the determined Kent; “I’ll drop you, sure, if you don’t promise.”

And poor Harry, caught in a trap, reluctantly had to yield his word.

One actor that night could enjoy beef and ale for supper; he was paid in full.

“Powell’s King Lear ought not to be forgotten,” says Davies; “it was a fair promise of something great in future.” We must, therefore, in passing give a glance at this brilliant young actor, who, but for his untimely death, might have risen to the highest ranks. The version of the play in which he appeared at Covent Garden in 1768, when Garrick was in Italy, was prepared especially for him by George Colman. Some of the original Shakespearian text was restored, and Tate's love scenes between Edgar and Cordelia were banished. But the happy ending of the play was retained, while the Fool was still suppressed, though reluctantly. "After the most serious consideration," said Colman, "I was convinced that such a character in a tragedy would not be endured on the modern stage."

Tate's miserable adaptation returned with the Kembles; and John Kemble, "very great in the curse," made King Lear a notable character in his list. You remember what Mrs. Spranger Barry said of the two successive styles of acting,—the Garrick school, "all rapidity and passion, while the Kemble school was so full of paw and pause that at first the performers, thinking their new competitors had either lost their cues or forgotten their parts, used frequently to prompt them." Yet even Garrick's admirers regarded Kemble's Lear as grand when, six weeks after his marriage to Mrs. Brereton (the widow of the actor who, his friends said, had gone mad for love of Kemble's sister, Mrs. Siddons), he played the mad King of the play to the Cordelia of that sister, at her benefit in January, 1788. The actress herself did not regard the rôle of the pious daughter with much favor, since it was a secondary character of the play, in her mind; and she never made a deep impression in her interpretation.

Sometimes the spectators laughed when Kemble's Lear put on the crown of straw and the flowers, the wits even declaring he reminded them of the sugar king on a Twelfth-Night cake; but yet even the light-minded could not forget the magnificent force he had put into that terrible curse:—

“Hear, Nature, hear; dear goddess, hear!”

That benefit performance of 1788 electrified London, and gave the actor his first impulse into favor. As time went on Kemble gradually toned down his too hale and vigorous Lear, till it showed more decrepitude and more solemn dignity. His brother Charles played “Poor Tom” admirably,—in fact, some said he was always at his best on the stage when mad or drunk,—and later on he played the same character to the Lear of Junius Brutus Booth and the Edmund of W. C. Macready. This latter performance was at Covent Garden, in 1820, when the elder Booth and Edmund Kean were pronounced rivals.

For some time Lear had been banished from the stage by royal command, as the affliction of the central figure bore too close a resemblance to the malady of England's monarch to prove agreeable. But the death of George III., on the 29th of January, 1820, removed the restriction; and on the subsequent 13th of April the play was produced. The Covent Garden manager hurried the date in order to take the edge from the announced revival by Kean at Drury Lane. At first he sought Macready for the leading rôle; but that conscientious man would not head such a move against a brother actor, though he was willing to accept a secondary part.

Mr. Booth received censure and praise. The friendliest words said, "His execution of this character was transcendently beautiful." The scene in which he is turned out to bide the pelting of the pitiless storm was declared by the same writer as one of terrific grandeur; while his recitation of the passage,—

"Blow, winds, and crack your cheeks! rage! blow!
You cataracts and hurricanoes, spout
Till you have drench'd our steeples!"

was said to be sublime. But others cried, "Rant and bluster!" The pit certainly applauded to the echo.

What could have been the thoughts of jealous

Sally Booth, the Cordelia of that evening, when she heard the applause showered upon the Lear? Only five years before, when the dashing young actor was just beginning his career in London, Miss Booth, fearing lest some one might think she was a relation of the subordinate player, kindly suggested that he relieve her of the odium by adding an “e” to his name!

A pretty incident illustrative of Booth’s kindness of heart was told the writer by an actress who often acted in “Lear” with him, Mrs. W. G. Jones. One night long ago she was cast for Regan. In those days books of the play were hard to find, so she borrowed one to study her part. Lack of time, however, left her very imperfect in the lines; and yet Booth, at rehearsal, instead of being angry, generously said to the overwrought lady, “Never mind, my dear; I will not stop for cues.” After the play Mrs. Jones heard two men commenting on the fine acting of the Lear, and adding, “That stupid Regan nearly ruined the whole scene;” but not a word of reproach did the whole-souled Booth utter, though he knew, better than any one else, how much his scenes were injured. A warm tribute, too, Mrs. Jones paid to Booth’s power in acting Lear; it was expressed in a single sentence: “He played so grandly that I really cried throughout it all."

The next August after Booth's appearance in opposition to Kean, five months before his marriage to Mary Anne Holmes, and eight months before his sailing for America, Booth played Edgar to Edmund Kean's Lear at Drury Lane. Hazlitt could not commend this Lear of Kean, pronouncing it "altogether inferior" to the same actor's Othello. "He failed, either from insurmountable difficulties, or from his own sense of the magnitude of the undertaking," said the critic. His contrasts appeared to be too marked, the Lear acting at the first too violently, tearing the curse to tatters, so that it became a piece of downright rant, and then at the last becoming too tame. The poet Campbell went so far as to say that Kean so lowered the tone of the character at times, that it seemed like an ancient whining beggar on the scene.

And yet the brilliant genius had many a time studied the part from midnight till noonday, standing before the mirror that he might note the effect of his facial expression, and had even visited the asylums to learn the forms of insanity.

Alas for the actor! Three years after the performance I have mentioned, the audience actually laughed at him — at him, the greatest player of his era! He had declared that when Londoners saw him, as Lear, over the dead body of Cordelia, they would go mad with him, so powerful would be his acting. But pretty Mrs. West, his Cordelia, proved too heavy a load for the little actor to carry ; and so comical were his struggles with the weight as to start the spectators into a roar of laughter that did not cease until the curtain fell. That was in 1823, when the management of Drury Lane had, for the nonce, restored the original fifth act of Shakespeare to Tate's version.

This humorous effect on the spectators was somewhat different from that produced by another rival of Kean, the refined, gentlemanly player Charles Mayne Young, upon the impressionable Mrs. Piozzi. In her own words it is recorded under date of April 27, 1819, in her “Autobiography and Letters :” “Dr. Gibbes is hurried to death, the people are so ill. He saw me half in hysterics at Young's giving Lear, and he came the next morning to feel my pulse, kind creature.”

But now the Fool returns, and with him comes all the beauty of the play; for Macready, having the absolute management of Covent Garden Theatre, burned Tate at the stake, and restored the exiled

Master. Yet Macready feared the result. On the afternoon of Jan. 4, 1838, he superintended the first rehearsal of the tragedy, and that night wrote in his diary, "My opinion of the introduction of the Fool is that, like many such terrible contrasts in poetry and painting, in acting representation it will fail of effect; it will either weary and annoy, or distract the spectator. I have no hope of it, and think at the last we shall be obliged to dispense with it."

At that time the revived character had been cast to the low comedian of the company, one Meadows, who did not at all meet the ideal of the manager. Macready in his mind's eye saw in the Fool a fragile, hectic, beautiful-faced boy. Happily he described his mental picture to stage-manager Bartley on the day after the rehearsal, and the latter quick-witted friend suggested at once that a woman could best fill a part of that kind.

"The very thing!" cried Macready, delighted at the idea; "and Miss Horton is the person."

It was a happy thought.

Miss Horton (who afterwards was known as Mrs. Germon Reed) made a pronounced hit.

Macready's Lear ranked with Macbeth at the head of all his Shakespearian rôles. The gradual growth of the insanity was delicately sketched, while the tremendous violence of the first acts, and the touching tenderness of the last act, were beautifully contrasted. In his "Reminiscences," the actor-manager has given us his own conception of the character;—

"Most actors," he says, "Garrick, Kemble, and Kean among others, seemed to have based their conceptions of the character on the infirmity usually associated with 'fourscore and upwards,' and have represented the feebleness instead of the vigor of old age. But Lear's was in truth a 'lusty winter;' his language never betrays imbecility of mind or body. He confers his kingdom, indeed, on 'younger strengths,' but there is still sufficient invigorating him to allow him to ride, to hunt, to run wildly through the fury of the storm, to slay the ruffian who murdered his Cordelia, and to bear about her dead body in his arms. There is, moreover, a heartiness, and even jollity, in his blither movements no way akin to the helplessness of senility. Indeed, the towering range of thought with which his mind dilates, identifying the heavens themselves with his griefs, and the power of conceiving such vast imaginings, would seem incompatible with a tottering, trembling frame, and betoken rather one of ‘mighty bone and bold enterprise,’ in the outward bearing of the grand old man.”

Westland Marston, whose first play, “The Patriarch’s Daughter,” was brought out by Macready, praised the latter warmly in Lear, and as an instance of a fine touch of nature described the way in which the actor’s voice broke as his Lear repudiated the once idolized Cordelia, and then, as firmness quickly returned, hardened into inflexibility. A writer in the Cornhill Magazine saw Lear in a different light. This narrator said of Macready, “He made the most horrible faces when his passions were aroused, insomuch that I was once nearly put out of the theatre for bursting out laughing in ‘King Lear,’ when the mad king shrieked out, ‘Look ! look ! a mouse !’ And he made such a tremendous face, and rolled his eyes in such a supernatural manner at so small an animal, in his imagination, that if it had been at the end of the world I could not have kept my countenance.”

The revivals of Samuel Phelps at Sadler’s Wells, and of Charles Kean at the Princess’s, were scholarly and elaborate. But Phelps, like Charles Dillon, though he touched the heart with his sad picture of the suffering of the afflicted king, did not inspire awe or veneration. At Kean's theatre there was such ostentatious display of archæology, that a pointed joke was passed around hinting at a pedantic spirit in the manager. 'T was said that at rehearsal, when Edmund was giving to Edgar his key, Kean, watching the proceeding critically, suddenly called out, "Here, sir, here! Make more of that key, sir! Good heavens! you give it to him as if it was a common room-door key. Let the audience see it, sir; make 'em feel it, sir; impress upon 'em that it is a key of the period, sir."

Behind the gray, heavily lined face and the tangled, grizzly locks of Lear, at the London Lyceum in the latter part of 1892, few play-goers could at first discover the familiar and strongly characteristic features of Henry Irving, so admirably had he drawn the king in his physical appearance. On the mental side he gave scrupulous attention to the delicate details of the character, picturing Lear, as M. Taine has described him in the seemingly paradoxical term, "violent and weak," from the beginning to the end, raging in lack of self-control and in semi-insanity even before his mind completely gave away. It was a natural, human Lear, but not one that the public accepted as unreservedly desirable. Ellen Terry was Cordelia.

In America the story of "King Lear" begins on the 14th of January, 1754, when Hallam's company of players was closing its first season in New York. Malone and Rigby were two friendly rivals; and, as a compromise, the former acted Lear and Shylock, while the latter acted Romeo, in the first delineations of those characters in America. Succeeding Malone came Harman, the son-in-law of Charlotte Charke, that wild-mannered, strange-acting daughter of old Colley Cibber; and then came Lewis Hallam. With the latter's advent to the title rôle, his mother, Mrs. Douglass, retired from the part of Cordelia, yielding to the younger actress, Miss Cheer, who in turn gave over the part to Mrs. Hallam, Jr.

The Baltimore Company, in 1782, saw Mr. Heard as Lear, and Mrs. Bartholomew as Cordelia, while Mr. Shakespeare acted Edmund. Six years later Hallam and his company were evading the law in Philadelphia, where a legislative statute forbade a theatre, by "moralizing" on the "Crime of Filial Ingratitude;" in other words, acting "King Lear." When Boston first saw the tragedy, April 27, 1796, Lear was acted by Mr. Chambers, and Cordelia by Mrs. Snelling Powell.

The nineteenth century now opened, and with its advance came, as Lear, the square-faced, hook-nosed, wide-mouthed, brandy-loving George Frederick Cooke, of whom Lord Byron wrote, referring to his "Biography," "Two things are rather marvellous: first, that a man should live so long drunk, and next, that he should have found a sober biographer."

His King was a creditable performance, but not great. The staccato method of pronunciation he adopted, and the rumbling tones, militated against complete success. Yet it is said he was strong in the scene where he says, "No, Regan, thou shalt never have my curse," and when he cries, "Who put my man i' the stocks?" Thomas A. Cooper, in 1824, was declared unsuccessful, since a minor actor in the rôle of Edgar carried away the applause from the Lear of the night.

The acting of the elder Booth has been described; but, in connection with the American stage, mention may be made of that benefit performance of June 23, 1830, when Mrs. Trollope, as recorded in her "Domestic Manners of the Americans," saw Booth in the title rôle, and found the whole performance very bad. The Cordelia that night was Mrs. Mary Anne Duff, a Cordelia also to Edwin Forrest's King.

“Play Lear!” cried Forrest some years later, when a friend remarked that he had never seen the actor play Lear better than he had that night. “Play Lear! What do you mean, sir? I do not play Lear! I play Hamlet, Richard, Shylock, Virginius, if you please; but by God, sir, I am Lear!”

And the critical world could re-echo the phrase. Forrest was, indeed, a Lear to be remembered. As the years passed by, his impersonation of the character steadily increased in power, until at the end, when Lear formed his last Shakespearian rôle, the player was regarded as unsurpassable.

Sad was the final act. A new star, Edwin Booth, had arisen in the theatrical sky, and the people's favorite of earlier years found himself gradually declining. When he played in New York for the last time, in February, 1871, there was something genuinely pathetic in his choice of Lear. He never played the part better; but with a poor company in support, with wretched scenery to surround his acting, and a thin house in an unpopular theatre to greet him, each auditor could but think of him as the actual King Lear of the American stage. “He gave to his children, the public, all he had,” said one writer at the time, “and now they have deserted him. They have crowned a new king, before whom they bow, and the ‘old man eloquent’ is cheered by few voices. He bowed his head slightly in response to the acclamation of those scantily filled seats. But throughout the play there was an added dignity of sorrow which showed that the neglect of the public had wounded him. He knew his fate.”

EDWIN FORREST AS KING LEAR (In Act IV., Scene 6).

The poet Longfellow greatly admired Forrest’s Lear, pronouncing it a noble performance. His portrayal of madness was true to nature, often painfully so, while his delivery of the great imprecation of the first act ever drew thunders of applause. What though at times he would “roar and bellow,” and tear “a passion to tatters,” his friends pointed out that he possessed the great power of making the spectator feel that the acting was real, not mimic life, and even caused shudders and tears by his performance.

On the night of March 30, 1872, at the Globe Theatre in Boston, Forrest acted Lear for the last time. The next day, Sunday, he caught cold; on Monday and Tuesday he labored through the part of Richelieu, and with pneumonia threatening him, yet bade the managers post the announcement for Virginius the following evening. In vain the struggle. Disease held its arms around him, and though he lived on until the 12th of the following December, and even gathered strength enough for a few readings (the final one in Boston, Dec. 7, 1872); yet he never more was to appear as the hero among the declaiming actors of the stage. When, on that fateful day in December, the servant opened the door of the chamber, he saw his master, with folded arms, in the embrace of death. The very last summons had come painlessly and with little warning.

"Mr. Forrest's countenance, as made up for Lear, is inflexible, stern, and forbidding," declared the comedian Hackett, thirty years ago, adding, "He has, too, a favorite grim scowl; his eyebrows are made so shaggy and willowy, they hide the eyes too much; and his beard, though long and picturesque, covers some useful and important muscles of the face, making it rigid, and incapable of depicting effectively the alternate lights and shades of benevolence and irascibility as they fluctuate in Lear's agitated mind. Nor do I fancy Mr. Forrest's tread of the stage, with his toes inclined somewhat inward, like that of an Indian, for the reason that it renders Lear's personal carriage undignified." Others might differ from Hackett, but the sharp outline picture is worth repeating.

Leigh Hunt regarded Forrest's Lear as the best he had ever seen. Dunlap maintained that Forrest's energy, pathos, and fidelity to the character, surpassed even the "wonderful efforts" of George Frederick Cooke—and he had seen both play the part. As regards this point of fidelity to the character, it may be remarked that Forrest united from first to last the physical infirmity of the old King with his nervous irritability. The study of insanity had been made by the actor a personal hobby, fed by visits to the insane asylums of Europe and America; and into his impersonation he brought many of the peculiarities which he had noted in real life. At the beginning of Lear's madness the twitching of the fingers, the pressing together of the hands, and the other little signs that constant observers of Forrest noted as particularly his own, added to the utterance of the words in holding the audience spellbound in almost painful suspense.

At New Orleans one night, just as Forrest had finished the fearful curse, a spectator was heard to groan aloud. Those around him turned quickly, only to see the man's face set as if in a rigid death-grip, the mouth open and the eyes fixed, while the hands were clinched tightly together. A neighbor seized the entranced stranger by the shoulder, and with a sudden shake started the blood flowing again through his veins. With a gasp the man looked around, as if dazed, and then in a trembling voice whispered, "Is he gone?" They told him the scene was over. "A moment more," he responded, "and I should have been a dead man. I know it. That terrible acting overcame me."

That Forrest himself could continue his acting without diminution of interest, whatever unexpected incident happened, or whatever wrought-up emotion overwhelmed him, was illustrated one night in the early fifties while he was playing at the Broadway Theatre in New York. The last scene of the second act was on, when Forrest, lost in the frenzy of the part, tore from his head the white wig of Lear, and in maddened excitement hurled it across the stage. There he stood before the crowded house, a wrinkled old man with long hoary beard—and glossy black locks upon his head. Yet he neither hesitated in his acting nor weakened in his intensity. With harrowing sorrow he poured forth the awful denunciation of the king and father, while the spectators, so far from laughing, never even smiled, but remained closely rapt in the anguish of the scene.

The real Shakespearian "Lear" had not come to the American stage until Macready, who had revived the original in London, brought it here. On the night of Sept. 27, 1844, at the last appearance of the English actor on the Park Theatre stage, New York, the hitherto banished character of the Fool was restored (Mrs. J. B. Booth, Jr., née DeBar, acting the character), while Cordelia (Charlotte Cushman) no longer struggled with the abducting ruffians, or listened to the words of love from Edgar (Mr. Dyott).

To Macready's Lear at the Astor Place Opera House, in the beginning of that stormy season (1848–1849) which culminated with the Forrest-Macready riot during a "Macbeth" performance, there appeared as the Fool the lady whose life continues even to the present generation, Mrs. Clara Fisher-Maeder. The Cordelia was Miss C. Wemyss, while Goneril was now bestowed upon Mrs. George Jones, the actress who a few months before had been playing Cordelia to the elder Booth's Lear.

The younger Booth (Edwin) first essayed the character in the fifties, when, as a youth of twenty odd summers, he was trying to fill his emptied purse by a benefit performance at San Francisco, preliminary to a return to the East. There can, perhaps, be no more interesting description of his interpretation of the character than that written a quarter of a century later by Walter H. Pollock when commenting upon Booth's performance in London.

"From first to last," he wrote, in the Saturday Review, "the character, with its senility, its slowly and surely increasing madness, its overwhelming bursts of passion, its moving tenderness and feebleness, and, underlying and seen through all these, that authority to which Kent makes marked reference, was seized and presented with extraordinary force. So complete are the interest and the illusion, that it is only when the play is over that the fine art which enters the storm of passion is apparent, and that such delicate inventive touches as the suggestion to Lear's wandering wits of the troop of horse shod with felt are remembered. The character is, of course, the more difficult because it begins at such high pressure in the very first scene, that any coming tardy off after that scene has been successfully played would be unhappily accented. Nothing could well be finer than Mr. Booth's rage and disappointment with Cordelia and the half-insane curse which follows them; and throughout the scene his senile yet royal bearing, and that grace and happiness of gesture to which we have on other occasions referred, were marked."

A Lear of different physical mould was John

McCullough. Like Forrest, he possessed a magnificent figure and a royal bearing, while, unlike Forrest, he could "discriminate between the agony of a man while going mad, and the careless, volatile, fantastic condition—afflicting to witness, but no longer agonizing to the lunatic himself—of a man who has actually lapsed into madness." Both in the delicacy of forlorn mournfulness, and in the torrent-like out-pouring of impetuous invective, McCullough could satisfy the critical listener. It was said of him that gentleness never accomplished more than in this actor's pathetic utterance of "I gave you all," and "I'll go with you," while the subsequent rallying of the broken spirit and the terrific outburst, "I'll not weep," had an appalling effect.

James R. Anderson, Lawrence Barrett, and a few other players have acted Lear; but we will pass them by to notice, in brief, the two Italian actors, Rossi and Salvini, whose interpretations of the mad monarch have won merited praises.

Ernesto Rossi's magnificent Lear has been termed the best of his interpretations by reason of great subtlety in the contrasting of the old King's peculiarities,—his child-like credulity with his unreasonable obstinacy, his desire for affectionate regard with his terrible fierceness, and his forgiving nature with his revengefulness. His impersonation of Lear, says a foreign critic, is “the most powerful and pathetic interpretation of that onerous part which has yet been put forward by any tragedian — no matter of what nationality — since Macready’s retirement from the stage.”

Tommaso Salvini is a pictorial interpreter of Shakespeare. Thus Othello easily proves his best Shakespearian part. Lear was artistically ineffectual. He could look the King, but yet he was not regal in his acting. His rich voice could nobly give the words, but the psychological charm of the interpretation was lacking. Of his theatrical mechanism in the rôle, William Winter has given us this picture. Salvini, he says, “put the King behind a table in the first scene,— which had the effect of preparation for a lecture,— and it pleased him to speak the storm speech away back at the upper entrance, with his body almost concealed behind painted crags. Salvini was particularly out of the character in the curse scene, and in the frantic parting from the two daughters, because there the quality of the man behind the action seemed especially common.”

S H Y L O C K.

(IN EARLY DAYS.)

---

IT is a gala night at Lincoln's Inn Fields, and every eye is intent upon the stage. The gay ladies in vizards have even turned their flirting glances for a time away from the young gallants in the neighboring seats, while the serious critics of London town are forgetful of the notable people around them in their contemplation of the scene in front.

Most interesting of all is the adapter of the play, George Granville, the young man of four and thirty years, whose horoscope, as yet closed to his vision, will in less than a decade show him among the peers of the realm. As Lord Lansdowne, his title will associate him with his grandfather's famous exploits, since brave Sir Beville Granville fell fighting for the king at the battle of Lansdowne.

But the prologue is on. Let us listen. Shakespeare's Ghost is speaking, and thus addressing the Ghost of Dryden (to whose son the profits of the play are generously given by Granville) :—

“These scenes in their rough native dress were mine,
But now improved with nobler lustre shine;
The first rude sketches Shakespeare's pencil drew,
But all the shining master strokes are new.
This play, ye critics, shall your fury stand,
Adorned and rescued by a faultless hand.”

Mr. Granville may well blush at these complimentary words ; but he need not hide his head from the audience, for the prologue is not his own,—it is supplied by a friend, one Bevil Higgons. Fortunate it is, since the adapter of the play has enough to answer for in the roughly transformed scenes. Gobbo, Launcelot, and Tubal are omitted from the cast,—and the loss of Tubal, as can easily be surmised, weakens greatly the picturing of Shylock's mingled grief and anger,—while Bassanio is given lines from brother characters, and is even made heroically to offer his whole body as sacrifice in place of Antonio's pound of flesh, and, that failing, to draw his sword for a battle then and there in his friend's defence.

Thus Bassanio cries (in Granville's words) :—

“Stand off ! I have a word in his behalf,
Since even more than in his Avarice,

In Cruelty this Jew's insatiable ;
Here stand I for my friend. Body for Body,
To endure the Torture. But one pound of flesh
Is due from him. Take every piece of mine,
And tear it off with Pincers. Whatever way
Invention may contrive to torture man,
Practise on me ; let but my Friend go safe.
Thy cruelty is limited on him ;
Unbounded let it loose on me. Say, Jew,
Here's Interest upon Interest in Flesh ;
Will that content you ? "

Notice that the great Betterton is playing Bassanio; perhaps some of the alteration is due to the demands of this leading actor. It is a noble cast in support. There is Booth, splendid actor, as Gratiano; Verbruggen as Antonio; the coquettish Mrs. Bracegirdle, with dark-brown hair and sparkling eyes, as Portia; and Mrs. Porter as Jessica.

But stay. Shylock enters. Can we believe our eyes? Is this little, lively, red-wigged fellow to perform the part?

Why, this is Dogget! Thomas Dogget, whose songs and dances, and whose dialect acting, have so often made audiences roar with laughter. Already the smile goes round the play-house. Yes, and the actor assists the smiling. He glides peculiarly along; he casts odd glances hither and thither, rolling his eyes and twisting his mouth in a ludierous manner. He does not, to be sure, attempt burlesque or cheap guying; but every movement, expression, and turn of the voice is calculated to provoke a laugh, and proves successful.

Too true. Shylock is acted by the comedian of the troupe, and is acted strictly as a comic character. The great play of Shakespeare, which had completely disappeared from the stage after its author's death, had now for the first time returned, in 1701, and returned not only with its name changed to "The Jew of Venice," with its lines altered to suit the ideas of improvement of George Granville, but even with Shylock entirely transformed.

The die was cast. For a generation this mangled version of a masterpiece held the stage. As for our first known Shylock, Thomas Dogget, he is to-day best marked in fame through the really generous bequest in his will. On the river Thames, he said, every year on the 1st of August there shall be held a race open to the watermen of London; and to the winner shall be given "an orange-colored livery with a badge representing Liberty." The color of the livery and the date (celebrating the accession of George I. to the throne) indicate the strong political proclivities of the Whig actor. To this day his race is held.

When next Dogget acted Shylock, Booth had risen to the part of Bassanio. The successors of the famous little comedian himself were Benjamin Griffin and Tony Aston. The former was a minister's son, who had been designed for the trade of glazier, but who preferred to run away and become a wandering actor, and who ultimately won a good place as comedian in Drury Lane, as well as some note as a playwright. Aston was an odd fellow, who liked, above all else in the world, to stroll through country towns with his wife and son, giving a medley of scenes, and who, from his early education as an attorney, could successfully defend himself against threatened punishment for apparently infringing on the laws by his performances.

Away with the comedians, however; for at last the tragic Shylock is to return.

The scene now is Drury Lane; the time Feb. 14, 1741; the actor Charles Macklin. Strange to say, this Macklin had himself won his greatest praise as a comedian; but now, in spite of protests from manager and brother actors, rough, coarse, independent Macklin is determined to act Shylock in a serious way,—and every one who knows his quarrelsome, self-reliant character understands that he will have his way or die.

That the sturdy Irishman should aim to interpret his author correctly is not a matter of surprise, since we know how tenaciously he clung to the rights of the play-maker. "What's that?" he cried in surly anger to Lee Lewes, when the latter attempted to insert a supposed witticism into the lines of his character in Macklin's "Love à la Mode;" "what's that you're saying?"

"Oh," replied Lewes, in his off-hand manner, "it's merely a little of my nonsense."

"Humph!" grunted the playwright, "I'd have you understand, Mr. Lewes, that I regard my nonsense as better than yours, so you will stick to that, if you please, sir."

When the revived Shylock strode upon the stage, only a few months before David Garrick made his début, and by his magnificent acting inaugurated in England a new love for Shakespeare, Macklin was forty-one years of age, and yet had acted only minor parts in the plays of the master author. In "The Merchant of Venice" he saw his opportunity, and shrewdly led on Manager Fleetwood to announce the production. For a time he kept his own design to himself, merely walking through the rehearsals, and showing no sign of a desire to change the accepted Granvillian character. But in some way his scheme leaked out, and the bumble-bees buzzed around him.

His good friends earnestly besought him not to essay so hazardous an innovation; his enemies chuckled at expected disaster, and hypocritically urged him on. Fleetwood all but withdrew his consent. Quin, cast for Antonio, swore that the new Shylock would be hissed; while the Portia and Nerissa of the cast, romping Kitty Clive and Mrs. Pritchard, agreed with the other actors that "the hot-headed, conceited Irishman, who has got some little reputation in a few parts, would bring himself and the theatre into disgrace." But Macklin, stubborn fellow always, never wavered a hair.

The night of the 14th came. The house was filled with the best people of the town, while in the very front rows of the pit sat the sober-faced critics with pencils and wits sharpened for a lively tilt. It was a momentous occasion for the actor; but though his heart beat faster than usual (as he afterwards confessed), yet he kept a bold front outside, and with an assumed confidence advanced to the stage.

A long, loose black gown hung from his shoulders; upon his face appeared a peaked beard; while his head was surmounted by the red hat which the actor, after patient research, had decided was always worn by the Jews in Italy.

During the first scenes Macklin made little extra effort, knowing that they were not strong enough to carry him to victory, and if overacted might bring instantaneous defeat.

His judgment was good. The critics saw that the keynote of the character was well taken, and with a wise nod to their neighbors were heard to whisper, "Very well; very well, indeed," "The man knows what he is about."

Macklin caught the remarks, and gathered renewed courage.

At last came the great third act, for which he had reserved himself. Seriously, earnestly, pitifully, tempestuously, he poured out the words of mingled grief at Jessica's flight, and joy over the losses of Antonio.

Now his blood was on fire. They should learn he was right. They should see he could act. Those jealous fellows at the wings should understand the greatness of his skill, and the critical men and women in the audience should be thrilled by the very power of his emotion. And they were.

Applause with hand and foot shook the candles almost from their sockets, and rattled the windows in the old house; in fact, Macklin was obliged several times to stop the torrent of his acting in order to give the auditors chance to vent their enraptured feelings.

Fleetwood, overjoyed at having such a tremendous attraction thus unexpectedly placed near his treasury, grasped the actor by the hand as he came from the stage, exclaiming, "Macklin, you were right!"

After the trial scene, wherein a greater triumph was awarded Shylock, the green-room was suddenly crowded with critics and with noblemen rushing in to offer their honest compliments.

"I confess it," declared Macklin in his later years, "that was one of the most flattering and intoxicating situations of my life. No money, no title, could purchase what I felt. And let no man tell me after this what fame will not inspire a man to do, and how far the attainment of it will not remunerate his greatest labors. By heaven, sir! though I was not worth fifty pounds in the world at that time, yet, let me tell you, I was Charles the Great for that night."

"There was forcible and terrifying ferocity in his Shylock's malevolence," declared Francis Gentleman (The Dramatic Censor). "He possessed by nature certain physical advantages which qualified him to embody Shylock," said John Bernard in his "Retrospections," "and which, combined with his peculiar genius, constituted a performance which was never imitated in his own day, and cannot be described in this." "If the Almighty writes a legible hand," swore Quin, after the play, "that man's Shylock must be a villain;" while Pope's couplet will ever be repeated:—

"This is the Jew
That Shakespeare drew."

But of all the descriptions of Macklin's acting, that by Lichtenberg is the best. Referring to a performance of Shylock when Macklin was well along in years, the German writer says, "Picture to yourself a somewhat portly man, with a yellowish, coarse face, a nose by no means deficient in length, breadth, or thickness, and a mouth in the cutting of which nature's knife seems to have slipped as far as the ear, on one side at least, as it appeared to me. His dress is black and long; his trousers likewise long and wide; his three-cornered hat is red—I presume after the fashion of Italian Jews.

"The first words he speaks on coming on the stage are slow and full of import: 'Three thousand ducats.' The two th's and the two s's, especially the last after the t, Macklin mouths with such unctiousness, that one would think he were at once testing the ducats and all that could be purchased with them. This at starting at once accredits him with the audience in a way which nothing afterwards can damage. Three such words, so spoken in that situation, mark the whole character. In the scene where for the first time he misses his daughter, he appears without his hat, with his hair standing on end, in some places at least a finger's length above the crown, as if the wind from the gallows had blown it up. Both hands are firmly clinched, and all his movements are abrupt and conclusive. To see such emotion in a grasping, fraudulent character, generally cool and self-possessed, is fearful."

Mr. Macklin as Shylock.

CHARLES MACKLIN AS SHYLOCK (In Act IV., Scene I.).

On the 10th of January, 1788, when Macklin was eighty-nine, he appeared as Shylock, after an absence of several years from the stage. With old-time spirit he went through the first act, but in the second began to stumble over the lines, and soon was entirely confused. Before a word could be said, however, by friend or enemy before or behind the footlights, the manly old actor advanced to the front, and in solemn and touching accents said, "Ladies and gentlemen, within these very few hours I have been seized with a terror of mind

I never in my life felt before ; it has totally destroyed my corporeal as well as mental faculties. I must, therefore, request your patience this night, — a request which an old man may hope is not unreasonable. Should it be granted, you may depend that this will be the last night, unless my health shall be entirely re-established, of my ever appearing before you in so ridiculous a situation."

The audience applauded encouragingly ; and the veteran player, nerved by this sudden expression of good will, again took up his text, and with the assistance of the prompter struggled through the play.

Macklin lived to be ninety-seven years of age. Eight years before his death he made his final appearance upon the stage, playing, on the 7th of May, 1789, for his own benefit (and he needed money badly), the character of the Jew. The old man's mind had been failing for a year or more, so that the management provided an understudy in case Macklin broke down in his part. This was wise.

"When our Shylock had dressed himself for the stage, which he did with his usual accuracy," said William Cooke, his friend and biographer, "he went into the green-room, but with such a lack-lustre looking eye as plainly indicated his inability to perform; and, coming up to the late Mrs. Pope, said, ‘My dear, are you to play to-night?’—‘To be sure I am, sir! Why, don’t you see I am dressed for Portia?’—‘Ah! very true; I had forgot. But who is to play Shylock?’ The imbecile tone of his voice, and the inanity of the look with which the last question was asked, caused a melancholy sensation in all who heard it. At last Mrs. Pope, rousing herself, said, ‘Why, you to be sure; are you not dressed for the part?’ He then seemed to recollect himself, and, putting his hand to his head, exclaimed, ‘God help me! my memory, I am afraid, has left me.’ He, however, after this went on the stage, and delivered two or three speeches of Shylock in a manner that evidently proved he did not understand what he was repeating. After a while he recovered himself a little, and seemed to make an effort to rouse himself, but in vain: nature could assist him no further; and after pausing some time, as if considering what to do, he then came forward and informed the audience that he now found he was unable to proceed in the part, and hoped they would accept Mr. Ryder as his substitute, who was already prepared to finish it. The audience accepted his apology with a mixed applause of indulgence and commiseration, and he retired from the stage forever."

Thirteen years after Macklin first drew the proper Shylock, Sheridan essayed the rôle with moderate success at Covent Garden. His associate was Peg Woffington, the best of Portias by reason of her elegance in deportment, her spirit and archness; in Macklin's second season of the Jew she had played Nerissa to Kitty Clive's mimicking Portia.

Next, several comedians undertook the rôle of Shylock; but none dared turn it back so far into humor as had the men of earlier days. Shuter, the Launce-lot Gobbo of the Sheridan performance; King, the original Sir Peter Teazle (and the Shylock on Dec. 29, 1775, to the Portia of Mrs. Siddons when that accomplished lady made her first appearance on the stage); and Yates, who, the Dramatic Censor wished, "might never mutilate a line of blank verse again," — were all Shylocks of a wrong hue.

Henderson and Palmer were of different stamp. The former, making his London début in Shylock in 1777, achieved marked success, though his costuming was so shabby as to lead one man to surmise that it had been borrowed from a pawnbroker.

"There's good spirit in your performance," said old Macklin, a spectator at the production.

"Thank you," responded the "Bath Roscius." "But I'm sorry to say I never had the advantage of seeing your Shylock."

"Sir," responded the gruff veteran, bridling up, "you need not tell me that. I knew you had not; for if you had, you would have played it differently."

And yet Henderson was a great actor,—great in Hamlet and great in Falstaff. It is said that he was the first to change the reading of the line, "Signor Antonio, many a time and oft on the Rialto," from a common proverbial expression to an implication that Antonio had baited him not only often, but even "on the Rialto," where merchants most do congregate. This he did by emphasizing the last two words of the line.

That Henderson had good enjoyment in humor was apparent by the way he would, in public, mimic one of the theatrical managers who sought to teach him, the actor, how to interpret Shylock. "Yes," this know-it-all manager would say, with the wisdom of a Dogberry, "this Shylock, though he is a Jew—he's a Jew that walks the Rialto at Venice, and talks to the magnificos, and you must not by any means act such a Jew as if he was one of the Jews that sell old clothes and slippers and oranges and sealing-wax up and down Pall Mall." And Henderson would solemnly assure him he would not.

Over Palmer's Shylock, Macklin was severe. "He played the character in one style," declared the old fellow. "It was all same, same, same; no variation. He did not hit the part nor the part hit him!"

Then there were Ryder and Harley; but when even John Kemble, who first played the part in 1784 to the Portia of his sister, Miss E. Kemble, could not win great fame in the rôle, what can we expect from these others? While Black Jack was acting the rôle in England, the play-lovers across the water, in the United States of America, were recalling the few performances of "The Merchant of Venice" they had seen in the thirty odd years of their stage's existence.

With our theatrical history the "Merchant of Venice" has an interesting connection, from its being the first play produced by that band of actors, Hallam's Company, which was to inaugurate a regular stage in this community in place of the spasmodic performances previously given.

The picture is an odd one to eyes accustomed only to the glamour of the modern superbly equipped theatre. The scene is laid in the capital of Virginia; but the date is Sept. 5, 1752, and the Williamsburg of that day is a far different place from what it was to become a century and four decades later. A scattered village of perhaps some two hundred buildings, it has a thousand souls to make up the population; but out of these numbers scarcely a dozen mansion-houses are to be counted, and only a few hundred white people.

On this brisk fall evening excitement has risen to fever-heat through the gossip that has spread far and near regarding the English play-actors just over on the Charming Sally; and while the people slowly file out of the country store before the early hour of closing,—for the proprietor, book-keeper, clerk, and boy (all represented in one person), could not have been tempted, by any number of pennies, to keep open his establishment, and lose the pleasure of that night's theatrical performance,—old-fashioned family barouches, farm-carts, mule-wagons, and gigs, dash or rumble up the road from every outlying district, bringing gayly decorated women and store-clothed men, all whipping their nags to the theatre.

A theatre only by courtesy. It stands on the outskirts of the town, so near the woods that the actors can amuse themselves by shooting pigeons from the windows, and it consists merely of a rough warehouse, altered rudely to suit the needs of comedians. But this night a jovial audience gathers in its pit, watches with amusement the antics of the negroes in the gallery, and gazes with something of awe at the country gentry in the stalls, who, following the custom of old England, dare venture upon the stage between the acts, and chatter with the ladies and gentlemen of the troupe. To be sure, it is a gala day for Williamsburg!

Nor are the actors less impressed with the occasion. True, they had hardly expected to come from the busy streets of London, where the gay throngs of fashionable people were even then wisely discussing the merits of David Garrick, and praising the vivacity of Peg Woffington, into a wilderness, where the theatre is practically unknown; but had supposed that a town which could boast a capital and a "palace" for the governor, would show some reflection of the cultivated city they had left behind. Yet, in spite of this disappointment, they recognize the fact that there are sturdy planters of intelligence before them, and an enthusiastic crowd of youths, who, with eyes and ears wide open, will swallow the sights and sounds of the night as phenomena never to be forgotten.

So, after Mr. Pelham, the solitary musician of the theatre, has supplied the want of an orchestra by drumming out a classical overture upon his harpsichord, and Mr. Rigby, later the Bassanio of the cast, has read the prologue, written especially for the occasion by Mr. Singleton, the Gratiano of a half hour later, Mr. Clarkson, Mr. Wynell, and Mr. Herbert, clothed respectively in the characters of Antonio, Salarino, and Salanio, walk upon the stage, and the play begins.

The company is small, and there must be some doubling of parts. Hence, Mr. Hallam himself plays both Launcelot and Tubal. His wife is Portia. His daughter is Jessica. Master Lewis Hallam, who later on is to become the leading actor of his time, but who was then, like his sister, making a first appearance on the stage, is cast for the servant of Portia; and though he has but one line to speak, he loses his tongue completely when the time comes, stands shivering with stage-fright before the audience for a few moments, and then rushes in tears from the stage. Much better would he feel if he could see, as we see, that fourteen years after this inauspicious début he would be acting with success the chief character, the Jew of Venice, at the first Philadelphia performance of the play.

Mr. Malone, the first Shylock and Lear of the American stage, is transformed into Mr. Pugsby in John Esten Cooke's "Virginia Comedians;" but inasmuch as Mr. Cooke also transforms Mrs. Hallam into her own daughter, and makes numerous absolute errors in facts, it is safe to assume that the novelist is also unattached to truth when he allows the manager to say after the performance that "Shylock was too drunk" to play his part well.

The Philadelphia playhouse, a few years after Hallam's Shylock, saw another Jew, whose record, though interesting, is not enviable. He was a clever performer, even if Hallam, his rival, ironically classed him only as a "splendid amateur actor;" and he could excel particularly in Irish characters. In fact, General Washington held John Henry as an admirable impersonator, and delighted particularly in seeing him act Patrick in the "Poor Soldier." When Henry first came over to this country from England, he did not hesitate to allow his name to be advertised, at his wife's benefit, as a performer of the Harlequin who would "run up a perpendicular scene twenty feet high." How he did it is not recorded in contemporaneous journals.

The tall, majestic, handsome actor was born in Dublin, and had made his début at Drury Lane in 1762. Five years later he was in America. His first wife, the eldest of a family of four girls, was lost at sea when the vessel on which she was voyaging from Jamaica was burned. Then followed the peculiar and far from honorable circumstances which stained this player's life. Mrs. Henry left a sister Ann, who afterwards, as Mrs. John Hogg, became a great favorite with the old Park Theatre audiences in New York. With Ann as wife Henry lived for a time, but finally deserted her to marry the youngest sister of the family, pretty little Maria Storer. She was a perfect fairy in person, according to the story of those who acted with her; but her character is not enhanced by this willingness to accept the man who, the widower of one of her sisters, could thus desert another sister. If you would see her picture, read these words by the veteran player, William B. Wood, as given in his "Personal Recollections of the Stage." "She usually came full dressed to the theatre in the old family coach; and the fashion of monstrous hoops worn at that day made it necessary for Mr. Henry to slide her out sideways, take her in his arms, and carry her like an infant to the stage entrance. The carriage was a curious and rather crazy-looking affair; and lest the gout, which rendered it indispensable to him, might not be generally known as an excuse for such a luxury, he decorated the panels with two crutches crossed — the motto, ‘This, or These.’”

Poets of the last century wrote verses in Maria Storer’s honor :—

“ Enchanting maid!
Whose easy nature every grace affords,
And charms without the empty pomp of words.”

Wood declares she was a “prodigious favorite.” Dunlap accounts her the best singer America had ever known before the final decade of the last century. But the slight, blue-eyed Ariel (for that was her ideal part) could be irritable and tempestuous, could refuse to act if she did not like the character allotted her, or had failed to win all the applause she thought she deserved, and, chief of all, could accept John Henry.

Her retribution was sufficient. A few months after Henry died, his widow, poverty-stricken and demented, passed away in miserable death in a house back of the theatre where she had met with so many triumphs.

Nor was Henry himself less capricious and quarrelsome. In fact, he was very often involved in personal encounters; and on one occasion, at least, the stalwart fellow received a severe and probably well-merited drubbing from his associate Hallam, an active fellow, though much smaller. Gradually Henry grew unpopular; the chief rôles one by one slipped away from him, and the newspapers even allowed him to be insulted in their columns by letters railing at his incapacity. At last, worried on every side, he was driven to sell, for ten thousand dollars, his interest in the old American Company, and retired to die of quick consumption shortly afterwards, at the age of forty-seven.

Another Shylock of those early days, Mr. Chalmers, though an actor of experience on the English stage, seems to have been a vain and selfish man personally. The idolized Cooper, Mr. Fennell, Mr. Hipworth, and Giles Leonard Barrett, with one or two minor players, kept Shylock on the stage until the days of Kean and Booth. With the last two a new era opens.

S H Y L O C K.

(TO THE PRESENT DAY.)

---

BEFORE the curtain rises on Edmund Kean and Junius Brutus Booth struggling for supremacy, there should be mention of the notable Shylock, who led one of the greatest casts the play ever saw,—I mean George Frederick Cooke.

With the impressive Mrs. Siddons as Portia, her brothers, sturdy John Kemble as Antonio, and airy Charles Kemble as Bassanio, and those princes of comedy, Munden and Emery, as Launcelot and Old Gobbo, Cooke found a support that could put him to his mettle. That was in 1803, three years after his first appearance in the character in London. “I can conceive nothing so perfectly the Jew that Shakespeare drew as the voice, face, manner, and expression of Mr. Cooke,” said the veteran Dunlap. “Mr. Macklin may have been better; but it is almost thirty years since I saw Mr. Macklin, and my memory is not of such tenacious stuff as to enable me to make a comparison between him and Mr. Cooke."

With his long, hooked nose, his lofty forehead, and his dark, fiery eyes, the actor possessed a physiognomy that was strongly marked, even if not as elegant or classically striking as Kemble's. At the age of forty-four he first came to London, being engaged for a paltry six pounds a week at Covent Garden. His initial part was Richard III.; his second, Shylock. In the first character his triumph was complete; in the second, he won equal favor, particularly after his magnificent playing in the third act. Indeed, the savage exultation of his laugh in that scene was said actually to be frightfully impressive. Constantly he kept the "lodged hate" of the Israelite in view. When Portia asked that the bond might be torn, Shylock, in his reply, "When it is paid according to the tenor," showed not only a touch of fear lest she should tear it, but also a malignant delight in the realization of the penalty due.

And the man who could act this close, mean, and revengeful character was in private life one of the most open and reckless handlers of money the world ever knew. The day a certain man refused to fight the actor because Cooke was rich, and would therefore hold the favor of friends in any contest, the careless player pulled from his pocket a big roll of bills, and thrust the entire amount into the fire, exclaiming, “Look ye, sir! that was all I possessed in the world, three hundred and fifty pounds. Now I am a beggar, sir. Will you fight me now?”

JUNIUS BRUTUS BOOTH.

Proud he was, too, when in his drink. Charles Lamb tells the story of our Shylock’s experience with the architect of a theatre. At a dinner given to Cooke and to Brandon, the theatre box-keeper, by the man of plans and specifications, the player, as usual, drank all the liquor in sight, until he was beastly drunk. Then, having been politely shown the door by his host, who had tired of the tipsy fellow’s noisy eccentricities, Cooke suddenly turned, and, seizing his entertainer by both ears, exclaimed, “To think that I, George Frederick Cooke, have degraded myself by dining with bricklayers, to meet box-keepers!” tripped him on his head, and left him sprawling on the floor.

In equally energetic way did he attack with words a Liverpool audience which had dared to hiss him for being drunk on the stage. “What!” he cried savagely from behind the footlights, as he suddenly faced the condemning crowd, “do you hiss me — me, George Frederick Cooke! you contemptible money-getters ! You shall never again have the honor of hissing me ! Farewell ! I banish you. Why,"—and here he drew himself up to his full height as he hurled his final taunt,—“there is not a brick in your dirty town but what is cemented by the blood of a negro ! ”

Another time, when playing Shylock, Cooke was again hissed for the same reason ; he was too intoxicated to act. Two nights later, though advertised for Richard III., he failed to appear at all at the theatre. On the next night, when he did come on sober, the auditors marked his appearance with a storm of hissing. Instantly the fiery actor stopped his impersonation, and, turning to a brother player, exclaimed in anger, “On Monday I was drunk, but appeared, and they did n’t like that ; on Wednesday I was drunk, so I did n’t appear, and they did n’t like that. What the devil would they have ? ”

But let us pass now from Cooke to Kean, with one word to mention Charles Young’s Shylock.

Our most striking glimpse of Kean shows a fiery little man trudging through the snow on a blustering January night in the year 1814. Over his shoulders hangs a big coachman’s coat,—“the man with the cape,” the taunting stage doorkeeper had called him,—while in the pocket of that coat lie an old pair of silk stockings, a pair of shoes, and a collar, the scanty wardrobe the poor play-actor could bring to piece out the theatrical costume of the night.

He was on the edge of glorious success or terrible failure. Which was it to be?

Brought up as a waif in hard adversity, knowing with certainty neither father nor mother, tossed about the world as a little claimer, a strolling actor, and possibly an acrobat, the poverty-stricken husband and father had struggled through a hard winter,—Heaven alone knows how,—until this opening chance at great Drury Lane was proffered him. The offer came simply because the managers had nothing else to try. In all their company they had no tragedian who could draw an audience; Raymond, Henry Siddons, Rae, Pope, were fairly good actors, no more. For one hundred and thirty-nine nights the plays had been staged at an uninterrupted loss; bankruptcy was threatening.

And this young man from the provinces would come for eight pounds a week. Why not try him?

They offered Richard to the newcomer for his first night's rôle. Though controversy might ruin his every chance, the actor had the courage to say “No” to such a suggestion. For him to appear as the crook-backed monarch, bringing his small physique into contrast with the majestic Kemble, would mean an unfair competition at the very beginning of the tourney.

“Shylock or nothing!” he cried determinedly; and no pressure could move him from that ground. Strange to say, the management yielded. “The Merchant of Venice” was announced for the 26th of January.

They gave the débutant just one rehearsal for this momentous performance, and that on the morning preceding the evening of the play. Sneers and gibes met him on every side; but he cared naught for the malignant-tongued professionals of the metropolis. His eyes were on the future. “If I succeed to-night,” he cried to his wife at home, after the rehearsal, “if I succeed, I shall go mad.”

For the first time in months he dined on meat, a luxury that he felt then to be a necessity, with the fearful strain of the coming night before him.

The hours flew by. The theatre doors opened, and a small number of men and women straggled in. When the curtain rose the house was not half full. An old story for Drury Lane this had been; but that night was to change all.

The utterance of the words, “Three thousand ducats, well!” gained an approving nod from a capable critic in the front row. The strength of the phrase, “I will be assured I may,” drew a round of applause. Steadily through the scene the favorable impression grew, until at the end of the first act even his supercilious associates who had gathered at the wings to scoff over his innovations (as witnessed by them earlier in rehearsal) admitted that the young man of seven and twenty had obtained a foothold.

They tried to congratulate him. The sensitive fellow shrank from the shallow praise, and lurked about the shadow of the stage until the curtain again rang up.

Once more he was on the scene. The applause grew stronger, the good impression deeper. People looked at one another with significant smiles and raising of eyebrows, while they settled down into unexpected preparation for an evening of real entertainment. Now Jessica’s flight was divulged to the Jew—and the spectators no more even thought with pleasure on themselves and what they saw. They were lost to realization of their own existence. In the terrible whirlwind of passion upon the stage, the tempest of mingled anger and grief of Shylock, they forgot for the nonce that they were simply spectators, but lived with the bereaved father before them.

Ah, what a triumph! The house fairly quivered with excitement as the scene ended. A rain of applause stormed the falling curtain. But with the trial scene, full of novelties as well as power in acting, the player was carried to still greater heights; and none was found, on or off the stage, to say that the success that night of Edmund Kean was not phenomenal.

Stage-manager Raymond — he who had sworn that the young player's innovations would never do — now came to flatter and to fawn, and later, as we saw in the story of Othello, received a taste of Kean's resentment for such sycophancy.

Oxberry declared that it was beyond his comprehension how so small an audience could "kick up so big a row."

But Kean waited for little of this. Half crazed with excitement and joy, he rushed to his miserable home, lifted from the rickety bed his little boy, and, holding him in air, while he threw one arm around his wife, cried in exultation, "Mary, you shall ride in your carriage yet! And Charles — Charles shall go to Eton!"

What hope beamed in Mary Chambers Kean's eyes! In his poverty she had gladly married the struggling actor, and for six years had suffered every possible trouble and sorrow in his company. Never had a word of complaint passed her lips. Alas, the future! Riches were to pour into the family coffers; but with them came trouble of a different character, even to estrangement. And yet to the last she remained faithful and devoted to her recranted husband, and when life was ebbing away hastened to his side to comfort the pain of the last sad hours.

But in this opening month of the year 1814 all is happiness. Richard follows Shylock; Hamlet and Othello next. For seventy nights the plays go on, and the managers place their profits at twenty thousand pounds. After the third performance Kean's pay is raised to twenty pounds a week, and gifts of one hundred pounds and five hundred pounds are made. In vain some of the meanest actors continue their sneers at the newcomer.

"Humph! I allow he 's an excellent Harlequin," snarls one.

"Yes," responds good-natured Jack Bannister, "that he is; for he 's jumped over all our heads."

But thirteen years later! The scene is different.

In the interval Kean has visited America, has earned in all two hundred thousand pounds, has met with disgrace through his unfaithfulness to his wife, has been hissed in both continents for his ungentlemanly conduct, and now returns to Drury Lane, again on a January night, to play Shylock.

“I shall not soon forget the scene,” said Dr. Doran, describing the night; “a rush so fearful, an audience so packed, and a reconciliation so complete, acting so faultless, and a dramatic enjoyment so exquisite, I never experienced. Nothing was heeded — indeed, the scenes were passed over — until Shylock was to appear, and I have heard no such shout since as that which greeted him. Fire, strength, beauty, every quality of the actor, seemed to have acquired fresh life. It was all deceptive, however. The actor was all but extinguished after this convulsive, but seemingly natural, effect. He lay in bed at the Hummum’s Hotel all day, amusing himself melancholily with his Indian gew-gaws, and trying to find a healthy tonic in cognac.”

The magnetism of his name lasted, however, a few years longer; then came that sad performance of “Othello” on the 25th of March, 1833, when the curtain dropped forever on the stage-career of Edmund Kean.

Two years before his retirement Talfourd saw his Shylock, and in one pithy sentence portrayed the impressiveness of the impersonation: “ His look is that of a man who asserts his claim to suffer as one of a race of sufferers; and when he turns his sorrowful face in silence to the frothy coxcomb who rails at him, we feel the immeasurable superiority of one who finds, in the very excess of his misery, his kindred with a tribe oppressed for ages, to the insect boaster of the day.”

The actors at old Drury had soon been won over to recognition of the genius among them; that is to say, all but Comedian Dowton. They subscribed for a silver cup to present Kean. “ No,” declared the jealous player of humorous rôles, when asked to contribute; “ you may ‘cup’ Mr. Kean if you like, but you shall not bleed me.” Curiously enough, this excellent Sir Anthony Absolute, Sir Peter Teazle, and Sir John Falstaff, also tried Shylock’s rôle; but the audience saw little except comedy in his impersonation, and even laughed heartily at the innovation, devised by Dowton, of Shylock dropping fainting into the arms of a party of Jews in court when he was bidden to become a Christian.

There seemed, about this time, to be another craze among the comedians to capture the character. The ingenious and skilful actor of elderly gentlemen, William Farren, made several essays at the part; but that the audience never was held intensely enraptured is illustrated by one incident at Birmingham. Farren was at that time tall and lean; and when, in the most serious tones of Shylock, he cried,—

“The pound of flesh that I demand is mine;
’T is dearly bought, and I will have it,” a gallery god shouted forth, “Let him have the pound of flesh; let old Skinny have it! He needs it bad enough!”

The next day the town was covered with placards (pasted broadcast through the humor of Bunn, the well-known manager). They read:—

“A reward will be given for the apprehension of a tall, thin, lanky-looking man, who last night committed a most barbarous murder upon a rich old Jew of the name of Shylock. The murderer is supposed to have escaped from Birmingham in one of the early Liverpool coaches.”

The tragedians returned with Macready; but yet, at the outset, that capable player was not satisfied with his own impersonation. “It was an utter failure,” he wrote in his diary on Sept. 30, 1839.

"I felt it, and suffered very much from it." Some four seasons later, however, he admitted that he performed the character "very fairly," and even enjoyed the interpretation so well that he could add, immediately on the next line in his diary, the invigorating record that at supper he "took a gin mint julep by way of experiment," and found it "the most deliciously cunning compound that ever I tasted. Nectar could not stand before it; Jupiter would have hobnobbed in it." Surely the "Merchant" that night must have gone off remarkably well to lead the usually self-lashing, unhappy diarist to write in so genial a vein.

With Samuel Phelps, the Jew was the first character to be portrayed on the London stage. The young man came up from the provinces to startle Macready somewhat with fear of a rival, and appearing on Aug. 28, 1837, at the Haymarket Theatre, under Webster's management (to the Portia of Miss Huddart, afterwards Mrs. Warner), was pronounced by the Morning Chronicle of the next day, "Correct and judicious, but not remarkable or striking." The critics declared that he fell far short of Kean, particularly in comparison with the latter's power of throwing something of sublimity into Shylock's character.

But Kean it was who, while acting Shylock, had first noted and praised the ability of the young player. That was in 1831, in a small town in the north of England.

"Who is that Tubal?" queried the great actor, after his famous scene in the "Merchant of Venice."

"It's Samuel Phelps, sir," was the reply of the stage-manager.

"Send him to me."

Tremblingly the actor obeyed, supposing he was to be taken to task for some bad error.

"Phelps!" exclaimed the famous Kean, clapping him on the shoulder the moment he entered the dressing-room, "you have played Tubal very, very well. Persevere, and you will make a name."

Well did he remember the injunction! His later fame as a Shakespearian reviver who dared to bring out all but six of the thirty-seven plays of the Bard is alone glory enough, aside from the reputation he won as a sterling actor.

Meanwhile, the baby whom a half-crazed father's hands had lifted from the cradle, to predict a career at Eton as his future hope, had enjoyed that privilege, and had stood on the threshold of three professions,—the army by his own desire, the navy by the desire of his father, the church by the desire of his mother. All these predilections, however, were thrown to the wind after the elder Kean's dissipations had squandered his fortune and estranged his family. In October, 1827, Charles appeared upon the stage.

Acquiring later the control of the Princess's Theatre in London, the younger Kean there brought out with magnificent, and then entirely novel, splendor "The Merchant of Venice." The scenery gave accurate views of Venice; the stage showed stately processions and busy throngs, a vivacious carnival and masquerade, besides gorgeous pictures of Belmont and the Hall of the Senators. But Kean himself as Shylock was pronounced only passable.

"Too much youthful vivacity and grace of movement for an old money-lending Jew," was Herman Vezin's comment as he viewed his fellow-actor with a professional eye; while Punch acknowledged the actor-manager's deep research into antiquarian lore by dryly remarking that Kean (who never could pronounce "m" otherwise than by the sound of "b") had evidently proved Shylock a vegetarian, since he read the lines thus:—

" You take by house when you do take the prop
That doth sustain by house, you take by life
When you do take the beans whereby I live."

A mispronunciation this, which reminds one of the slip of the tongue made by Charles Kemble in Shylock, when he tried to say, "Shall I lay perjury upon my soul?" and instead so tangled his tongue as to exclaim, "Shall I lay surgery upon my poll?"

With Charles Kean as Shylock in the grand representation of 1858, appeared Mrs. Kean as Portia. The Launcelot Gobbo was Harley. On the night of August 20 this last-mentioned veteran comedian, then seventy-two years of age, had amused the audience by his customary buoyant acting, and with lively step rushed across the stage bridge to make his exit. Scarcely had he reached the wings, while the laughter of the audience still rang in his ears, when he fell to the floor, stricken with paralysis. Friends rushed to give assistance. The actor tried to speak, but could not utter words coherently. In a few hours he was past all consciousness, though still breathing. On the afternoon of August 22, suddenly waking from his lethargy, he murmured, in the words of Nick Bottom in the "Midsummer Night's Dream," "I have an exposition of sleep come over me," closed his eyes, and passed away.

Come we now to the last of the great English Shylocks, Henry Irving. His conscientious revival of the comedy gave the entire play to the stage, rather than the customary version ending with the discomfiture of Shylock in the trial scene, and with the splendid stage dressing presented a feast for the eye.

HENRY IRVING AS SHYLOCK.

Mr. Irving's Shylock is a "gentlemanly Jew." On the night of his first appearance in the character, at the London Lyceum, Nov. 1, 1879, the spectators looked with astonishment at the new portrayal before them. The commonplace Hebrew money-lender, dirty in costume and in appearance, had disappeared, giving way to a refined, well-dressed dealer in money. As the trial scene opened, there approached no crouching, bloodthirsty miser, scowling and greedy, but a distrustful, adroit, and dignified pleader; while Shylock's baffled departure from the scene, with tottering movement and bewildered look, combined with a single glance of scorn cast at the insulting Gratiano, made a strong contrast to the "old school" bombastic methods, and formed an artistic picture.

Twice, at least, Irving on a Shylock night has had to meet a diplomatic emergency, and twice has he met it well. The first time was in Edinburgh, when the students of the University, in boyish fashion, made themselves obnoxious with talking and laughter, mixed with applause and cat-calls. They drowned the words of the actors. Suddenly the curtain fell in the midst of the scene. Every one was instantly on tip-toe of curiosity to see what would happen. Instead of an angry manager appearing on the scene, Mr. Irving, cool and smiling, came to the front, said he noticed that there seemed to be some misunderstanding on the part of certain members of the audience, and that since the first scenes, as a result of the misunderstanding, had not been heard at all, he proposed beginning the play all over again. This unexpected, good-natured dealing carried the hearts of the auditors, and the play, begun again, went on happily to the end.

On the other occasion, when the hundredth performance of the “Merchant of Venice” at the Lyceum was celebrated by a dinner on the stage, given after the performance by Mr. Irving to his friends, Lord Houghton proposed the host’s health in a speech that was either very sarcastic or very ill-judged. Formerly, he said, Shylock had been performed as a ferocious monster, but under Irving’s treatment he became “a gentleman of the Jewish persuasion, in voice very like a Rothschild, afflicted with a stupid servant and a wilful and pernicious daughter, to be eventually foiled by a very charming woman." Furthermore, the gentleman said he supposed if Mr. Irving undertook the character of Iago, he would, on the same principles, make him a very honest man who was devoted to watching over Othello's wife. To reply courteously to such a speech must, indeed, have been a hard task to the actor; but he lost neither his temper nor his wit, turning aside the awkward statement of Lord Houghton with courteous yet pertinent remarks.

The actor who may well serve as the link connecting the stage across the water with the stage of this land is Junius Brutus Booth. His early experiences were in competition with Kean in London; his later life was as a leader, with few competitors, in America. As for his Shylock, in that he could take genuine interest; for he was as well versed in the Koran as in the Bible, could sympathize with the Jews deeply, since he honestly regarded them as an oppressed race, and could, by his knowledge of the tongue, even repeat the lines of the character, when he chose, in the Hebrew dialect.

His Jew was gloomy but grand, the embodiment of merciless fate. Yet, says a critic of former days, speaking of the elder Booth's impersonation, "Shy-lock's more special personality,—if we may so express it,—his hatred of Antonio, not simply ‘for he is a Christian,’ but because he has hindered him in his usurious practices, was not merged and lost in his representation of the character. Booth kept the two distinct, skilfully using the former in order to throw out in darker background the shadowy presence of the latter. Finally, in keeping with this rendering of the part is the exit of Shylock from the machinery of the piece on the termination of the fourth act. The lighter and more graceful work of the play goes on; but Shylock withdraws, and with him this grand, gloomy, cruel past which he represents, while the light-hearted, forgiving, and forgiven children of the day bring all their wishes to happy consummation.”

Edwin Booth would tell the story of his father passing hour after hour in learned discussion in the vernacular with a scholarly Israelite of Baltimore, contending on Hebrew history, and particularly maintaining that he himself was of Hebraic connection, since the Welsh, from whom he was descended, were of Jewish origin.

Once the peculiar eccentricity of Junius Brutus Booth broke out during a production of “The Merchant.” It was in Philadelphia in 1851. The actor was seen about the green-room very early that evening, but when the curtain was to be rung up he was nowhere in sight. What should be done? Had he run away,—after the manner of some of his odd doings,—or had he fallen through a trap?

The question was hastily discussed; and, as the audience was getting impatient, it was decided best to start the play, and trust to finding Shylock before the time of his entrance. Meanwhile, the theatre was searched, and messengers were hurried to the hotels and the neighboring bar-rooms. No Shylock to be found.

The time had almost come for the Jew's appearance, and Mr. Frederick, the stage-manager, in despair made ready to go upon the stage and inform the audience of Mr. Booth's "unprincipled conduct," when suddenly a door in a little dark scene-closet opened, and Booth, calm and stolid, quietly walked out, gently pushed aside the stage-manager, and, proceeding upon the scene, delivered his lines in magnificent manner. Whether, as his daughter always maintained, Booth had been nervous over his appearance that night, and had retired to this queer spot in order to be absolutely undisturbed, or whether it was the freak of a great mind to madness closely allied, no one can tell.

It was about a year after this that an interesting production of the "Merchant of Venice" occurred in New York. On the 6th of September, 1852, at Castle Garden, a centennial performance was given "in commemoration of the introduction of the drama in America, at Williamsburg, Va., in 1752." Charles W. Coulcock acted Shylock; Mr. Burton, Launce-lot; and Mrs. Vickery, Portia. With the Shakespearean comedy was given also the same Garrick farce, "Lethé," played by the Hallam Company a hundred years before.

James W. Wallack was a notable Shylock, and in that rôle had the distinction of acting at his own New York theatre thirty-three successive nights, beginning Dec. 9, 1858, thus assisting in the longest run up to that date ever enjoyed by a Shakespearean play. His Portia during the run was the talented Mrs. Hoey; Bassanio was Lester Wallack. The close of the run, Jan. 9, 1859, marked the last performance of the Jew that Wallack ever gave, while it preceded by only four months his retirement from the stage. The latter event occurred on the 14th of May, when the veteran actor played Benedick in "Much Ado about Nothing."

Edwin Forrest for a time acted Shylock, but soon dropped it from his répertoire. George Vandenhoff, Gustavus V. Brooke, who, like Kean, made the character an exalted avenger of his race; E. L. Davenport, less impetuous than Kean, but with impersonation more highly colored than Young; Lawrence Barrett and Bogumil Dawson, have appeared with success as Shylock: but none of these equalled Edwin Booth in that character.

It was as Shylock that Mr. Booth made his first London appearance, in the autumn of 1861, at the Haymarket Theatre, and under very unfavorable circumstances. The celebrated Buckstone was the manager, and the preparation for that event reflects but slight credit upon British kindness or courtesy in management or criticism. No pains seem to have been taken to secure even a respectable introduction of Mr. Booth to London audiences.

The American himself, justly annoyed at his poor surroundings, acted with indifference, while the English supporting company, with some few exceptions, were supercilious and offensive to the visitor. In fact, Mr. Booth's sister asserted that on that fateful night every one on the stage, in the expectation of a storm of hisses for Shylock, was more nervous and frightened than the untried actor himself. His Shylock was coldly received.

His later success as Richelieu, during this same engagement, brought a tardy tribute from actors, press, and public.

Mr. Booth made an elaborate American presentation of the "Merchant of Venice" at the Winter Garden Theatre, New York, on Jan. 28, 1867, and the play ran seven weeks. The Winter Garden was then under Mr. Booth's sole management. In later years another notable revival of the play brought Lawrence Barrett as Bassanio, and Mr. Booth as the Jew, before the public as united stars.

One interesting if not remarkably pleasant experience Mr. Barrett and Mr. Booth had with the "Merchant of Venice" at the very beginning of their combined career in the fall of 1887. They had contracted to open with the tragedy a new opera-house at Kansas City, and therefore were promptly on hand on the desired night. But what a sight met their eyes! The management, in spite of all efforts, had not been able to keep the contractors up to the agreed time; and as a result the theatre was entirely destitute of roof, and was rough and cluttered from top to bottom. But the tickets had been sold, the actors were there, and the managers desired the performance to go on. One scene had to answer for the entire play ; fortunately that scenery was boxed in, so that it partly protected them from the cold. The spectators wore their hats and coats, and the actors willingly sought refuge inside their ulsters whenever they could escape from behind the footlights. One bit of realism was probably never before carried out in any modern theatre ; for the night scene the actual moon lighted up the stage.

LAWRENCE BARRETT.

Mr. Booth's Shylock reached its height in the trial scene, in the contrast of the hard, rapacious Jew in his seeming triumph (illustrated by Mr. Booth through the glittering eye and crouching form that marked his advance with the knife upon Antonio) with the opposite phase of portrayal, the broken, wrecked old man who staggers away from the room defeated on every point. But in the quieter parts of the play Mr. Booth was equally great, though less noted by the careless observer, and in instances such as that wherein he ponderingly intrusted the keys to Jessica, displayed fully the thoroughness and finish of his impersonation.

If ever there was a character that came hard to Booth it must have been Shylock, judging by the actor's letters to Mr. Furness, when he was assisting that eminent Shakespearian scholar with practical suggestions. "Shylock haunts me like a nightmare," he wrote one day. "I can't mount the animal—for such I consider Shylock to be. I made an effort to get at him through G. F. Cooke's notes on his own acting of the part, and was surprised to see how he was influenced by tradition. He acknowledged having followed Macklin in much that he was praised for in this part."

A few months later, in a humorous vein, Booth wrote to the same correspondent about the character, which he had once called so "earthy" that he could feel no inspiration in the atmosphere of the play, "My dear Furness—Hold on! The Jew came to me last evening just as I was leaving Pittsburg, and stayed with me all night on the sleeping-car, whence sleep was banished; and I think I've got him by the beard or nose, I know not which, but I'll hang on to him for a while, and see what he'll do for me. I'll have his pound of flesh if I can get it off his old bones."

When Lawrence Barrett played Shylock he gave a justification—the Jew's own justification—of the brutality of the coveted penalty. He acted the part with dignity, while at the same time he filled it with intensity. As for his appearance in the rôle, no better portrait can be given than that of a playgoer of 1886, who pictured the impersonator as “tall, moving with slow strength across the boards in front of the scene that does duty for the Rialto, standing in a quietude almost statu-esque in its pose, robed in his black Jewish gaberdine, bordered with red, and marked with a red cross on the elbow, a black and yellow cap on his gray, bent head, his richly jewelled hands betraying the nervous eagerness of his nature as they clutch and twine upon his long knotted staff, with a withdrawn look of his strong-featured face, and a reserved intelligence dwelling in his eyes.”

Richard Mansfield has essayed Shylock, as well as Richard III.; but as yet the chief fame of this actor rests with his vivid character sketches in “The Parisian Romance” and “Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde.”

CORIOLANUS.

---

ONE night Edwin Booth and his father were sitting before the bright open fire, enjoying the play of "Coriolanus." The elder Booth was reading the book; the younger, then a mere lad, was listening with undisguised pleasure. On went the glorious recitation until the little clock on the mantel had struck the small hours of the morning. No sooner were the last words of the text reached, than Junius Brutus Booth launched forth into a noble tribute to the marvellous acting of his former rival, Edmund Kean, giving to his eager son, for the first and only time in his life, reminiscences of the struggling days in England.

"Father," cried Edwin, as the elder player finally ceased his grand description of the acting of Coriolanus, "why don't you take that character?"

"I?" replied the veteran. "Nonsense! 'T would seem absurd for one of my inches to utter such boastful speeches. I cannot look Coriolanus."

This, then, was the reason the elder Booth, hero of so many of Shakespeare's plays, never attempted the rôle of the haughty Roman. And yet, as Edwin Booth has declared, his low stature militated not in Brutus, when from the very force of his curse of Tarquin, the patriot seemed to tower ten feet high, while his pathos in the part moved even the stage supernumeraries, who played the mob, to genuine tears and sobs.

In America, Booth would have found few comparisons possible. In fact, up to the beginning of the present century but two impersonators of Coriolanus are known to have appeared. The first was John P. Moreton, of the Philadelphia Company.

Moreton's real name was Pollard; but financial troubles in India, where he appears to have indiscreetly loaned funds from the bank of Calcutta, in which he was employed, drove him back to England in disgrace, and presumably led him to cancel his real name when the actor's profession was opened before his eyes. He was an American by birth, it is said, his father having served in the British army in the colonies. Moreton's progress was rapid here; for quickly he rose even to the character of Hamlet, and before many years could demand thirty dollars a night for his special performances.

In the cast of that Philadelphia production of "Coriolanus," on June 3, 1796, the Volumnia was the amiable Mrs. Whitlock, the youngest sister of the great Mrs. Siddons of the English stage.

As the last year of the eighteenth century was turning its meridian, a second Caius Marcius strode upon the mimic field of battle. This was Cooper, the wealthy but prodigal Thomas Abthorpe Cooper, who by his performance at the Park Theatre, on the 3d of June, 1799, may stand recorded in history as the first Coriolanus of the New York stage.

A young actor then, just passing his twenty-third summer, and with a stage experience of less than seven years, Cooper yet could show the strength that was in him in a far different manner from that fateful day in 1792, when, making his début in the character of Malcolm in "Macbeth," he broke down so completely that Stephen Kemble, the manager, bade him take his salary and leave the theatre. But the plucky youth would not leave the stage. In 1796 he came to America, and here became a leader, playing in triumph through the chief cities, and earning a fortune of two hundred thousand dollars. His money, however, disappeared under his extravagant living and reckless improvidence.

As illustrative of the latter characteristic a story may be told.

One day while talking with a friend on Broadway, New York, the tragedian noticed a load of hay approaching. "I will bet you the value of my benefit to-night," exclaimed Cooper, on the spur of the moment, "that I will pull the longest wisp of hay out of that load."

"Done," cried his jovial friend. "I'll bet a like amount."

They pulled, and Cooper lost. "Oh," he exclaimed, in the most careless manner conceivable, "there's two hours of acting lost." But those two hours meant the receipt of twelve hundred dollars.

That he must have made a noble Coriolanus may be surmised when we read the poetic description of his personality, as written by Samuel Woodworth : —

"For when in life's bright noon the stage he trod,
In majesty and grace a demi-god,
With form, and mien, and attitude, and air,
Which modern kings might envy in despair ;
When his stern brow and awe-inspiring eye
Bore sign of an imperial majesty ;

THOMAS ABTHORPE COOPER.

Then — in the zenith of his glory — then
He moved, a model for the first of men.
The drama was his empire : and his throne
No rival dared dispute — he reigned alone !”

And yet this man of noble mien and majestic look could play odd tricks of ungentlemanly eccentricity. Joe Cowell, the comedian, was sitting on the sofa in the green-room one night, waiting for the tragedy to end so that he might go on in the farce. The mirror being directly over Cowell, when Cooper came forward to adjust his toga, the brother player moved aside his head to give the great actor a chance to use the looking-glass, but did not move his person. Thereupon the dignified stage Roman, in the most undignified manner, put his own head a few inches in front of Cowell’s face, and stared contemptuously at him.

Cowell was more than his match. He returned the stare, and at the same time emphatically uttered the one contemptuous word, “Booh !”

There was a roar of laughter in the green-room ; and Cooper, astonished at the temerity of the clown, left the place. A few days later, however, he practically apologized to Cowell, and thereafter accepted him as an intimate associate.

One of the strangest whims of this famous actor was disclosed in later conversation with his new-made friend. Cooper was boasting that his children never cried. He stopped that habit, he said, in the following unique way : "When my children were young, and began to cry, I always dashed a glass of water in their faces, and that so astonished them that they would leave off ; and if they began again I'd dash another, and keep on increasing the dose until they were entirely cured."

To one of those same children came the distinction of being the daughter-in-law of a President. Miss Priscilla Cooper, born of the tragedian's second wife (the daughter of the famous wit, Major James Fairlee, and grand-daughter of Chief Justice Robert Yates), married Robert Tyler, a son of President Tyler, and for a time, while the President was a widower, presided at the White House. It was through her influence, moreover, that her father in his later years, after his fortune had been dissipated, secured a government appointment at the Arsenal near Philadelphia, and later another appointment in the New York Custom House.

A pretty story is told of their first appearance together ; for Miss Priscilla had taken to the stage in her girlhood, in order to assist her impoverished father. It was in 1834, on the occasion of her first appearance, and of her father's benefit in New York. As Cooper, in the rôle of Virginius, bade them send to him his daughter Virginia, and the girl came tripping in, exclaiming, in the appropriate words of the text, "Well, father, what's your will?" the whole audience burst into a prolonged round of cheers and applause, so cordial and so enthusiastic as to move both the father and daughter to tears. Fifteen years later Cooper died in the arms of Priscilla.

Blessed with a splendid voice in tone and compass, with wonderfully expressive eyes and a fine figure, with the power to make "his form in anger that of a demon, his smile in affability that of an angel," Cooper yet lacked the judgment in understanding and interpreting Shakespeare necessary to place him in the front rank of all the impersonators of the Bard's characters.

With Cooper, in that first New York production of "Coriolanus," there appeared as Volumnia an actress of towering stature and tragic skill, Mrs. Giles Leonard Barrett. In England, as Mrs. Rivers, she had been a pupil of Macklin, and one of the scores of Portias to his famous Shylock. Two years before this "Coriolanus" performance, she had made her American début, with her husband.

And now an actor of longer record on the English stage tempts the favor of Americans. He is John Vandenhoff, the father of George Vandenhoff. His Coriolanus, on the night of Sept. 11, 1837, at the National Theatre in New York, marking his début there, had as support Mrs. Flynn in the rôle of Volumnia, and Henry Wallack in the part of Tullus Aufidius.

Westland Marston had seen the actor in London, and there declared that as Coriolanus he displayed great dignity, a powerful and melodious voice, and a finished and impressive skill in acting, due to careful preparation. He was never great, however. Strange to say, this impersonator of the Roman hero was, in his own person, mortally afraid of a cat. He could not bear a feline near him. One day, in fact, at the house of a friend, when the innocent pet of the household chanced to enter the room with its customary friendly "meow," the tragedian gave forth a shriek that startled not only his friends, but drove the innocent kitten in a rush of terror out of the room.

Vandenhoff had been originally intended for the priesthood. He visited America twice before his retirement in 1858. Three years later (October, 1861) he died, at the age of seventy-one, following, by one year, his daughter, the original Parthenia in "Ingomar."

A contemporary of Vandenhoff, James R. Anderson, made his first appearance as Coriolanus in America at the Park Theatre, New York, April 14, 1845, with Miss Clara Ellis as Volumnia. Anderson was then twenty-six years of age, and in Macready's company in England had the honor of being the Chevalier de Mauprat in the original production of Lord Lytton's "Richelieu." His several visits to America made his name well known here; but, like the elder Vandenhoff, he continued to the end an English actor.

The American players are now in the green-room. Let us marshal forth their Coriolanuses. First, there steps forward a muscular, heroically moulded figure, with strikingly robust face, a man who might have stood as a model for Hercules in form, and whose face could well depict the Roman. It is Edwin Forrest, the idol for many years of the theatre-going public.

Recall the story told of him in former years, if you desire a good illustration of the physical characteristics of the man. He was playing then a Roman general, and, according to the directions of the play-book, was to be attacked by six minions of the enemy. At rehearsal Mr. Forrest was dissatisfied. The supernumeraries fought too tamely. They did not make the scene sufficiently realistic.

With good round oaths he bade them fight, fight, fight! and not dodge back and forward as if engaging in a child's game. The supers at first sulked over his hot words, and then they formed a plot among themselves. At the performance that night it developed. They were going to make a genuinely hot fight, a rough and tumble that their traducer would remember. To his astonishment they leaped upon him in the fiercest manner, raining blow after blow against his head.

For just one instant Forrest fell back astounded. Then, as he realized the situation, his breast expanded in indignation, his brow grew dark in cloudy rage, and with a half-suppressed oath he leaped into the midst of the crowd, struck out with his powerful arm now to the right, now to the left, and in a trice had vanquished the enemy completely, leaving one super sticking fast in the bass-drum in the orchestra, whither he had been knocked by a powerful blow, four of the rest dressing their wounds in the green-room, and the sixth, terrified out of his senses, rushing from the theatre, yelling "Fire" at the top of his voice.

The audience applauded to the echo. They had never seen Forrest "act so splendidly," they declared one to the other.

It must have been with somewhat of that same enthusiasm that the audience cheered the actor when he played Coriolanus at the notable engagement in the Broadway Theatre, New York, a number of years after his first appearance in the part. The interpretation was so admirable that the spectators lost sight of the actor, and saw only the heroic soldier. "The crowning triumph," declared one of those present that night, "came in the closing scenes of the third act, when the banishment of Coriolanus is announced by Brutus, amid the huzzas of the populace. The stage of the Broadway Theatre had even more than the usual gradual elevation as it receded from the foot-lights. In the position where Forrest stood he seemed to have acquired additional height, as with flashing eyes and dilated form he rushed towards the retreating rabble, and thundered out his concentrated scorn in the exclamation, 'I banish you!'"

When Forrest acted the title rôle of the tragedy at Niblo's Garden, in November, 1863, with Mme. Ponisi as Volumnia, the Cominius of the production was a young player destined some years later to assume in his turn the chief character,—John McCullough. The Irish-born lad, totally ignorant of art and literature, and with not even the ability to write, though he could read a little, had immigrated to America at the age of fifteen. Working in a chairmaker's shop, he chanced to meet a "stage-struck" fellow-workman; and being thus led to an acquaintance with the theatre, eagerly and devotedly studied for the stage. In 1857 he made his début, and for twenty-seven years continued an actor; then his mind gave way, and he was retired to an insane asylum until death speedily ended his misery.

In 1861 Forrest had become interested in the youth, and before long had made him the leading man in his company. Next came McCullough's starring tour, when Virginius, Brutus, and Spartacus, as well as Othello, Richard III., Lear, and Coriolanus, won him fame and wealth. Kind, generous, and high-minded in his ambition, McCullough was regarded as a warm friend by hundreds, while thousands pitied the sad ending of what had seemed a rugged, sturdy life.

The best words that can be said of his Coriolanus are those of his warm friend and admirer, William Winter. Mr. Winter pronounced McCul-lough's impersonation equal to that of Forrest in physical majesty, while it was superior in intellectual haughtiness and in refinement. The actor's declamation was as fluent as his demeanor was massively graceful. He looked Coriolanus to the life. "The stormy utterance of revolted pride and furious disgust, in the denial of Volumnia's request," said Winter, "the tempestuous outburst, 'I will not do it!' made as wild, fiery, and fine a movement in tragic acting as could be imagined; but the climax was reached in the pathetic cry, 'The gods look down, and this unnatural scene they laugh at.'"

JOHN McCULLOUGH.

Meanwhile, England's great Coriolanus had long since passed away. There had been but one actor on the British stage to identify himself with the rôle, and that was John Philip Kemble, the most stately, dignified player of the last century. To be sure, his Coriolanus was not sufficiently barbaric to satisfy Leigh Hunt, since by the substitution of a polished patrician manner he failed to meet that critic's ideal of the rough soldier of primitive Rome; but yet its tremendous force and grandeur were irresistible.

It was strange Kemble could not break away entirely from the ruthless adapters of Shakespeare, and present this tragedy from the original version; but though he gave more of the master's lines than had his predecessor, Sheridan, yet still he could omit passages of such excellence as that beginning, "His nature is too noble for the world," and could adopt many phrases from Thomson.

It was in 1749, forty years before Kemble's Coriolanus, that Thomson's version had been brought out at Covent Garden, with gay Peg Woffington painting her pretty face into wrinkles, in order to portray faithfully the character of Volumnia.

The poor poet had died suddenly, before this last work of his had ever been performed; and so his friend, kind-hearted old Quin, the veteran actor, arranged to bring out the declamatory tragedy for the benefit of the author's destitute family, and, free of charge, to play the hero's rôle. Lord Lyttelton, too, was interested in Thomson's family; and so, to help the production, wrote an epilogue for Mrs. Woffington, in her own person, to speak, its lines running in this vein:—

"If an Old Mother had such pow'ful charms
To stop a stubborn Roman's conq'ring arms;
If with my grave discourse and wrinkled face
I thus could bring a hero to disgrace,
How absolutely may I hope to reign
Now I am turned to my own shape again."

JAMES QUIN AS CORIOLANUS (In Act V., Scene 3).

It may be unjust to have a bit of fun over generous Quin in Coriolanus; but as the audience laughed merrily one hundred and fifty years ago, we of to-day may be forgiven. The roar went up when Quin, who had acquired the affectation of pronouncing the “a” long in fasces, bade the soldiers lower their fasces, and they literally obeyed, until their faces even touched their bows.

Quin’s costume to-day would bring a smile. Topping his long flowing-haired wig was a cap with upright plumes at least two feet in height, while beneath his elaborately decorated tunic was a short, stiffened skirt, that stood out much the same as does a ballet-dancer’s of to-day. Skin-tight breeches and buskins completed the attire.

Two adaptations had preceded Thomson’s: that wretched affair of 1682, by Nahum Tate, brought out under the title “Ingratitude of a Commonwealth; or, The Fall of Caius Marcius Coriolanus;” and the failure of 1719 by John Dennis, the good critic and the bad playwright, brought out under the title of “The Invader of his Country; or, The Fatal Resentment,” and acted for three nights only, with Booth as Coriolanus, and Mrs. Porter as Vololumnia.

But never did a combination equal that of John Kemble and his sister, Mrs. Siddons. The actress, indeed, won even higher praises than did the actor.

Charles Young, the experienced Shakespearian interpreter, sat in the audience on the 7th of February, 1789, and actually wept when the Siddons wept, and smiled when she smiled. He told of the scene afterwards. "Ah," said he, "in that triumphal entry of her son Coriolanus, her dumb show drew plaudits that shook the building. She came along marching and beating time to the music, rolling (if that be not too strong a term to describe her motion) from side to side, swelling with the triumph of her son. Such was the intoxication of joy which flashed from her eyes, and lit up her whole face, that the effect was irresistible. She seemed to me to reap all the glory of that procession to herself. I could not take my eyes from her. Coriolanus, banner, and pageant,—all went for nothing to me after she had walked to her place."

As for the noble Coriolanus, eight and twenty years later he was playing the rôle with all the strength and glory of his early years, with no abatement of spirit and energy, as Hazlitt said, and none of grace and dignity. This was his farewell of the stage.

It was a Monday night, the 23d of June, 1817, and the house was crowded. Applause showered upon him constantly. When, after the last act, he approached the footlights to make his formal address, a shout, as from one mighty voice, filled the theatre, “No,—no farewell.”

But it had to be. Infirmities were pressing upon the actor, now in his sixtieth year; and, though he knew it not, he was then within a few years of his last scene upon earth.

The actors crowded around him in the green-room after the curtain fell, saw Talma’s wreath of laurel presented to the great English player, and then, in their turn, begged for memorials. He gave to each a trinket of some sort,—something that he had worn upon that very stage, and, finally, to Mathews presented his sandals. “Yes,” cried the comedian, “I have John Kemble’s sandals. I never could tread in his shoes, but in these, at least, I can step.”

It is said that even to the last the force of “Black Jack’s” acting was such, that when Coriolanus in haughty pride dashed against the mob, the crowd involuntarily fell back, without the aid of assumed acting, driven by the very impetuosity of his mighty power.

Even upon John Howard Payne, whose “Home, Sweet Home” was to make his name immortal, this allusion of reality was forced. Payne was in London in 1817, and, writing to a friend in America, thus described the Englishman in the tragedy:—

“I can never forget Kemble’s Coriolanus; his entrée was the most brilliant I ever witnessed. His person derived a majesty from a scarlet robe which he managed with inimitable dignity. The Roman energy of his deportment, the seraphic grace of his gesture, and the movements of his perfect self-possession, displayed the great mind, daring to command, and disdaining to solicit admiration. His form derived an additional elevation of perhaps two inches from his sandals. In every part of the house the audience rose, waved their hats, and huzzaed; and the cheering must have lasted more than five minutes.”

And yet this proud actor was not without his enjoyment of humor. During one of his favorite impersonations — it might possibly have been Coriolanus, for that was dear to him — a child in the audience began to cry, and, uncontrolled by its mother, kept up the bellowing for an annoying length of time. At last Kemble could stand it no longer. He came to the front, and with significant emphasis, but yet with a smile on his lips, said, “Ladies and gentlemen, unless the play is stopped the child cannot go on with comfort.”

The play was not stopped,—but the child went out.

This humorous turn was akin to the witty manner in which the actor retorted to Shaw, the musical director who was attending to the rehearsal of “Cœur de Lion.” “Mr. Kemble,” cried the irritated leader, after the player with his bad singing voice had ineffectually attempted the song set down to his part, “you are murdering the time!”

“That may be,” promptly replied the actor; “but it’s better to murder time outright than to be forever beating it, as you are!”

Even better was the quotation at the toll-gate, when, returning with a friend from dinner, he tossed a coin to the old toll-keeper, and, waving away his proffer of the amount to be returned, cried out to his friend in exactly the tone, as well as the words, of Rolla, “We seek no change; and least of all such change as he would bring us.”

And this was the sedate and precise chieftain of the solemn, declamatory school of the eighteenth century, “the noblest Roman of them all,” as some one declared when praising his grand assumption of characters like Shakespeare’s haughty Caius Marcius.

Born forty years before the first Coriolanus appeared on the American stage, this English hero of the tragedy had passed through a hard novitiate before reaching the highest degree. The son of an itinerant player, he was destined by his father for the priesthood, and to that end was sent to a Roman Catholic seminary. There he displayed one admirable characteristic for theatrical work by committing to memory fifteen hundred lines of Homer,—learning this number in order to remove by himself the entire task placed upon his class for a general indiscretion. This remarkable memory stood by him all through life; in fact, one night he was willing to bet that after four days' study he could repeat every line in any newspaper, advertisements and all, in regular order, and without missing or misplacing a single word.

In 1776 he gained his desired foothold on the stage, and seven years later, at the age of twenty-six, made his London début, playing Hamlet. Although very ambitious and earnest, he yet progressed more slowly than his sister, the great Mrs. Siddons, but finally won eminence both as actor and as manager. In the latter rôle he lost his theatre, Covent Garden, by the fire of Sept. 20, 1808; but while all others were dismayed and disheartened, he boldly looked forward to a phœnixlike rising. Through the generosity of the Duke of Northumberland it came ; that nobleman, unsolicited, giving ten thousand pounds toward the new house.

The prices for playgoers were raised, on account of the expense ; and, as a result, came the famous O. P. (or Old Price) riot, that lasted for sixty-six nights, and nearly resulted in the mobbing of Kemble's family.

As he now neared the end of his career, no actor could be found to challenge comparison, until, in 1814, Edmund Kean dashed upon the stage, and with his fiery enthusiasm overthrew all the idols of the stately Kemble school.

But hot-blooded Kean, as Coriolanus, could not present the requisite repose for the hero, and therefore never equalled Kemble there. Moreover, he lacked the physical size and the bearing. Yet Doran said none but a great actor could have played the scene of the candidateness and that of the death as Kean did ; though in these very scenes it was admitted that he really deserted his own school, and followed the Kemble ideals.

Macready was but twenty-seven years of age when he attempted the character of the Roman, and yet in the rôle was well received. Barry Cornwall paid him a poetic tribute that declared :—

"And he shall wear his victor's crown, and stand Distinct amidst the genius of the land."

In later years, when Macready was his own manager, he gave to "Coriolanus" a magnificent revival. The senate scene saw nearly two hundred white-robed Roman fathers on the stage, with the Consul seated in state before the brazen wolf and its human sucklings, and behind, the sacred altar with its blazing fire. The "Siege of Rome" was pictured by a small army of finely equipped soldiers, with moving towers and battering-rams.

But to an ill-judging friend of Macready, who attempted to prove the actor superior to Kemble, by arguing that it was a mistake to suppose Coriolanus "an abstraction of Roman-nosed grandeur," James Smith replied in an epigram that grew popular in a day:—

"What scenes of grandeur does this play disclose, Where all is Roman — save the Roman's nose!"

Phelps was held to be "too impetuous and excitable for Coriolanus;" and no one in England since his day has achieved fame in the part. In fact, the British stage, as well as the American, awaits a worthy successor to the giant Coriolanuses of old.

PLEASE DO NOT REMOVE CARDS OR SLIPS FROM THIS POCKET

---

---

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY

---

---

PR
3112
W5
1896

Wingate, Charles Edgar Lewis Shakespeare's heroes on the stage

106

